———A mortgage of the joint family property of a Mithakshara family by its Karta (or Manager), unless necessity or an antecedent debt is proved, is void; the transaction itself gives to the mortgagee no rights against the Karta's interest in the joint family property.

In a suit to enforce a mortgage of joint family property of a Mithakshara family by its karta (or Manager), the High Court, being of opinion that the plaintiff had not proved that the moneys were borrowed for necessary purposes, dismissed the suit as against the sons of the mortgagor, but made a decree against the father (mortgagor) to the effect that, if the amount decreed was not paid within the period fixed, "the father's share in the mortgaged properties will be liable to be sold on partition."

———Onus of proof of—Son's admission of necessity discharging mortgagee from—Admission of liability by son in document subsequently executed by him to mortgagee for principal and interest and compound interest due under mortgage deed if amounts to.

In a suit brought against a Hindu son to enforce a mortgage bond executed by his deceased father and providing for interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per month with three monthly rests, the High Court held that an admission of liability on the part of the son in a document subsequently executed by him in favour of the mortgagee in respect of both principal and interest and compound interest under the suit bond, though not in any sense a ratification of what was done by the father, was presumptive proof of a justifying family necessity for the principal and interest, under the suit bond, and that, in the absence of evidence on the part of the son to rebut that presumption, he was liable for the amount due under the bond.

Held, dissenting from the High Court, that the admission in the subsequent deed would not constitute such proof of a justifying family necessity as would be sufficient to discharge the mortgagee from the onus of proving that there were special circumstances which entitled the father to pledge the joint family property on excessive terms of interest or of compound interest (24). ———Onus of proof of—Son's admission of necessity discharging mortgagee from—Mortgage bond subsequent by father in favour of same mortgagee—Suit against son on —Deed compromising—Recital in, that prior bond "is allowed to stand good as before—That is, the principal, interest and compound interest will remain due from me" —Effect of.

The suit was to enforce a deed of mortgage executed on 16th July, 1903 executed by the father and managing member of a joint Hindu family in respect of joint family property. The deed provided for interest at 3 per cent. per month with three monthly rests. The question was whether the father had authority to borrow on such terms. The High Court held that the mortgagee was entitled to recover the amount of interest provided for by the bond owing to an admission made by the defendant, the son, in the terms of a compromise entered into by him on the death of his father and referred to in a consent decree.

The said compromise was of a suit upon a subsequent mortgage executed by the father, the suit being instituted against the father and the son, and continued, after the death of his father, against the son alone. The arrangement was embodied in a consent decree, and was in part carried out by the execution of a sale-deed. The sale-deed contained this passage: "Be it known that the bond dated July 16, 1903, stands good as before, after payment of Rs. 1.000 as principal, besides interest and compound interest." The consent decree provided as follows: "Besides the amount claimed, Rs. 1,000, as principal and interest and compound interest due under the mortgage bond, dated July 16, 1903 is due from me under the bond. Only Rs. 1,487 out of interest and compound interest entered on the back of the bond has been realised. The bond is allowed to stand good as before—i.e., the principal interest and compound interest will remain due from me."

Held, dissenting from the High Court, that the words in the consent decree and in the sale-deed constituted no more than a reservation of the rights, whatever they might be, under the mortgage bond of July 16, 1903, and that they did not constitute an admission of a legal necessity either to the principal amount or of the rate of interest or compound interest (23).

The sale-deed in respect of that property stood in the name of A. The execution creditor alleged that it was fraudulently taken in his name instead of in the name of his son, and, in support of his case, the execution creditor relied upon the circumstance that possession of the property remained with the son. The consideration money for the conveyance was, however, proved to have been paid by the father.

Held, that the prima facie case which was made out by showing that the son was in possession was rebutted by the evidence that the father paid the consideration money for the conveyance to himself, and that the property was conveyed to him (157-8). INVALID SALE.

———Setting aside of—Son's right on—Recovery of entire property sold—Recovery of undivided share therein—Mithila law—Mithakshara law.

Quaere whether in a suit by a Hindu son, governed by the Mithila law, to set aside a deed of sale executed by his father, and to recover possession of the whole property alienated, the son had, on the setting aside of the deed, any particular share in the property alienated of which he was entitled to recover possession (333).

The Mithila law is very similar to the Mithakshara on this point. Under the Mithakshara law, no individual member of an undivided family, whilst it remains undivided, can predicate of the joint and undivided property that he, that particular member, has a certain definite share. It is probable that, on account of this rule of law, the suit was brought by the son not for the purpose of recovering his share, because he had no distinct or definite share to recover, but to recover the whole property upon the ground that the sale by the father was void, and that the whole property which the father had conveyed ought to be brought back again to be joint property for the benefit of the whole family. It is questionable whether a son can, under the Mithakshara law, recover an undivided share of ancestral property sold by his father (329-30). *N. To a suit by a Hindu son to set aside a sale of family property by his father for the sum of Rs. 18,000, the father was a party-defendant. Rs. 16,000 out of the Rs. 18,000, was satisfactorily shown to have been applied by the father for the discharge of antecedent debts binding on the son. The balance of Rs. 2,000 which was admittedly received by the father, was left unaccounted for. Though the father could have given evidence how that balance was applied his evidence was deliberately withheld. There was no evidence that it was used for immoral or unauthorised purposes.

———The plaintiffs sued for a declaration that a sale of ancestral joint family property made by their father, the manager of tha family, 16 years before suit was invalid, and for recovery of possession of the property thus alienated. The sale was made after due inquiry as to the legal necessity by the vendee. Such necessity was proved by him to the extent of Rs, 3,000 out of a total price of Rs. 3,500. The sale was for an adequate consideration. The vendee was not in a position to explain how the surplus of Rs. 500 was applied. The plaintiff's father was made a party to the action but did not defend. He was alive at the date of the trial, but died afterwards. The High Court gave the plaintiffs a conditional decree by which they were declared entitled on payment of Rs. 3.000 to have the sale set aside, and the property returned by the vendee.

Held, reversing the High Court, that the proper course, in the circumstances of the case, was to dismiss the suit in its entirety.

The fact that in such a case the vendee is not able to establish how the surplus of Rs. 500 was applied is not a sufficient ground in law either for setting aside the sale or, on sustaining the sale, for directing the repayment by the vendee of such surplus. The true question which falls to be answered in such cases is whether the sale itself was one which was justified by legal necessity. In any case where the sale has been held to be justified but there is no evidence as to the application of a portion of the consideration, a presumption arises that it has been expended for proper purposes, and for the benefit of the family. This is in line with the series of decisions in which it was held that where the purchaser acts in good faith and after due inquiry, and is able to show that the sale itself was justified by legal necessity, he is under no obligation to enquire into the application of any surplus and is, therefore, not bound to make re-payment of such surplus to the members of the family challenging the sale. ———A sale of joint family property will not be set aside merely because a part of the proceeds is not proved to have been applied to purposes of necessity. The real question that has to be considered is this : Whether the sale itself was justified by necessity. If the purchaser has acted honestly, if the existence of a family necessity for sale is made out, and the price is not unreasonably low, he (the purchaser) is not bound to account for the application of the price.

Where, in a case in which the sale was for Rs. 4,000, family necessity was made out to the extent of Rs. 3,500, and the balance of Rs. 500 was not fully accounted for, held that the sum of Rs. 3,500 out of Rs. 4,000 was surely a justification of sale for a family necessity proved up to that amount.

A practice appears to have crept up in the Allahabad High Court of investigating and settling these cases upon the principle of accounting. If, upon a strict accounting, it is found that, although it is completely established that by far the most substantial part of the consideration was for family necessity, yet if a certain balance of the price remains unaccounted for, or is insufficiently proved, then by that result the parties' interests are to be judged, and the sale is set aside, conditionally upon the re-payment by the vendor or his representatives of the substantial part referred to. It is manifest that this practice imperils transactions of sale which, in their real essence and substance, are sales made for family necessity. ———Throwing into common Stock of—Evidence of.

The question was whether the properties acquired by a Hindu father after his partition with his brothers were, as against his sons, self-acquisitions or joint family property.

It appeared that the father had considerable nucleus of ancestral property in his hands after the partition and that he kept one account of his income from the ancestral property and of his own earnings. Properties of considerable value were from time to time purchased by him, and he did not in any way discriminate between the sources of his income, but blended them all in one general account. His sons, when they became of age to earn their own living, gave the pay which they received to their father, with whom they lived and by whom they were supported.

Held, that that was strong evidence that there was but one common stock of the whole family, into which each voluntarily threw what he might otherwise have claimed as self-acquired ; and that the property purchased by, or with the assistance of, the joint funds was joint property of the family, and not of any particular member of it (70-1). ———Throwing into common stock of—Evidence of—Inheritance from collateral—Property got by—Throwing into common stock of.

The suits out of which the appeals arose concerned the validity and effect of two deeds of gift made by one D, deceased, the father of the first plaintiff and appellant, and grandfather of the other plaintiffs and appellants, in favour of two concubines and the daughter of one of them.

The son asserted that he and his father were joint members of a Hindu family, and that the properties to which the gifts related were part of the joint family estate. That was the question to be determined in the suit.

It was assumed that the properties covered by the deeds in question were got by D, by inheritance from a collateral and were therefore his self-acquired properties. The question for decision was whether D converted those self-acquired properties of his into ancestral family estate by throwing them into the common stock.

At the time of the death of the collateral above referred to in 1878 and the accession of D and his brothers to that collateral's property, D was acting as guardian of his divided younger brother K. Accordingly one book was kept for their joint-share of the collateral's estate ; and that system of book-keeping, which started on 2nd October, 1878, was continued till 11th February, 1880, when K came of age. Thereafter, no separate book was kept by or for D in respect of the property which had come to him from the collateral ; but there was one account for all D's receipts from all sources, whether it was income from joint family property, or from that which he had acquired from the collateral, or any other source of revenue, and similarly for all his expenditure of whatever kind.

The first plaintiff and appellant had been born on 31st May, 1877, and from that time forward there had been a joint family estate for him and his father. Nevertheless, the accounts from 1880 onwards were such as to show a blending of the properties.

It further appeared that when in the year 1881, D and his younger brother, K took the further step of effecting what was called " a deorh partition," that is, not merely a separation of interest, but an actual partition of the several properties constituting their estates, mutual exchanges were made whereby D gave up his share in some ancestral family property for K's share in property which came to him from the same collateral, and vice versa.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Held, reversing the High Court, that, assuming that D acquired his share of the property of the collateral as self-acquired property, he so dealt with it afterwards as to make it joint property with his ancestral family estate, of which family, the first plaintiff, and, as they were born, the other plaintiffs were members (745). ———Son living separately from father but not completely separated from him.

A Hindoo had only self-acquired estate. Previous to his death his three sons separated in food and left their father's house, living separately. The question was whether property purchased after the separation in the name of one of the sons, and business carried on in his name, and the profits derived from that business, formed part of the joint family estate or constituted the separate property of that son.

Held, on the evidence, that, although there was a cesser of commensality, the normal condition of a joint Hindoo family, did not, from the evidence, operate as a complete separation, and that the properties in question formed part of the joint property. PURCHASE IN NAME OF.

———Benami or not.

The appellant and respondent were brothers, and joint heirs by the Hindu law of their deceased father, R. Many years before his death, and previously to the birth of the appellant, R purchased a talook in the name of the respondent. The question was whether the purchase in the name of the respondent was a mere benami purchase, or a purchase for the respondent's separate use and benefit. There was no question but that all the purchase money was provided by R. It was certainly not the money of the respondent.

The grounds on which the respondent relied in support of his case that the purchase was for his separate use and benefit were the age of the respondent at the time of the purchase (he being a mere infant at the time), the English form of conveyance, the accounts kept by the father in his books, the different mode in which the purchase in question was treated in the books of the father from purchases in the names of other persons; a document submitted to him as a case in another cause, containing a statement of his title, though that was claimed on each side; certain letters relating to the property; certain memorials addressed, one to the Deputy Collector of Hooghly, and another to the Deputy Governor of Bengal, relating to the tenure of the property, and parol evidence as to conversations; to which might be added the evidence of the conduct of the respondent and appellant after their father's death, the benefit of which was claimed on each side.

Held, on the evidence reversing the Supreme Court, that the purchase was a benami purchase, and that the respondent in whose name it was made was a trustee for the father, and that the property in question was part of the father's estate at the time of his death (85-6). It is objected that a Hindoo in those Provinces (which are governed by the Mithakshara law) who has sons or other male descendants must be held to be incapable of making by will an unequal distribution amongst them of immove able property, whether self-acquired or ancestral; because by the law of the Mithakshara his sons in both cases take, on their birth, an interest in the property, which their father without their consent cannot displace. For the respondent it is contended that this question is concluded by the decision in the Bithoor case (9 M.I.A. 96). The appellant, however, insists, that this decision is opposed to the law of the school of Benares, and relies on the texts of the Mithakshara, which show that a father cannot alienate his self-acquired estate, or make an unequal distribution of them by partition, without the consent of his sons ; and also upon passages in Strange's "HINDU LAW," and other authorities. It has been argued, on the other hand, that all these authorities are to be reconciled with the decision in the Bithoor case, by holding, that they relate to property acquired by the father, with the use or by the aid of ancestral estate ; and that they have no application to separate or any self-acquired property in the strict sense of the term. Their Lordships are relieved from the necessity of determining whether this distinction is well founded, or whether, if it be not so, the present case must be governed by the Bithoor case (38-40). The plaintiffs were members of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mithakshara and they sued to recover proprietary possession of a share in a certain mouza, alleging it to be part of their undivided property. The defendant, who was in possession, resisted the suit on the ground that the property in question really belonged to his wife, to whose rights he succeeded when she died. The plaintiffs produced a conveyance of the year 1863, under which the property in question was conveyed on sale to B, guardian of her son, S, then a minor, both being members of the plaintiffs' joint family. There was also evidence that the purchase consideration was provided out of joint funds. The rights of S descended to the plaintiffs, and it was not contended that B took any interest for herself. The defendant produced no conveyance in his own favour, but claimed that the purchase of 1863 was in truth a benami transaction for the separate benefit of his wife.

Held, that, though in the first instance the burden of proof was on the plaintiffs, the burden of proof passed to the defendant very early in the case (Lord Sumner.) MOTI LAL v. KUNDAN LAL. (1917) 22 M. The suit was brought by grandsons of a Mithakshara joint family to recover family property improperly sold by their grandfather deceased. To the suit the plaintiffs made their fathers parties. It was argued that, though the sale might be invalid and the plaintiffs entitled to recover possession, they were not entitled to do so without paying to the vendees the money received by their grandfather by reason of their "pious obligation" to pay his debts.

Held, that no such doctrine could be invoked in the circumstances of the case (236).

The respondents sued to set aside a sale of joint family property effected by their grandfather and their grand uncle, the then managers of the family. The respondents contended that the sale was not for purposes binding upon them. The major portion of the consideration for the sale was proved to represent a debt for which family property could validly have been sold. The evidence as to a minor portion of the consideration was vague. The sale had been made long before the date of the suit, and the principal parties to the transaction had died. The respondents' father and uncle, who were throughout aware of the circumstances connected with the sale, and who supported the respondents, never themselves took any steps to impeach the sale. On the other hand, the respondents' father admitted in his evidence given in the suit that his inaction was at all events partly attributable to the fact that he could at no time prove that his father, a vendor, had spent the sale consideration after receiving it "in bad company or for immoral purposes."

Held, that, in considering the question of the necessity for the sale, it was proper to bear in mind that inaction of the father and the uncle of the respondents and the ground attributed by the father for such inaction. (Lord Blanesburgh.) LAL BAHADUR v. AMBIKA PRASAD.

In a suit brought in 1865 it was fonnd that there was a declaration of trust by the defendant (with whom a summary settlement had been made and to whom a sunnud had been granted in favour of the joint family consisting of himself and of the plaintiffs), and that up to the time of the quarrel in 1865 all the villages in suit were held by the defendant in trust for the family, as a joint family estate, governed by the rules of the Mithakshara. The plaint in the suit did not allege that the plaintiffs had been dispossessed of their rights in the said villages, but merely that the defendant intended to dispossess them, and to put a stop to the profits enjoyed by them, and they simply prayed that, after inquiry, proper orders might be passed that they be not deprived of their right.

Held, that their Lordships must deal with the case as it stood at the time of the commencement of the suit (168).

At that time there does not appear to have been any complete separation or division of the family, and the plaintiffs do not pray for a partition of the estate. The appellant (plaintiff) was not entitled to a definite portion of the estate, but merely to the rights of a member of a joint Hindu family. Their Lordships cannot therefore do more than declare that the defendant holds the villages in suit in trust for the joint family, and as a joint family estate, governed by the rules of the Mithakshara, and order and declare that the defendant do cause and allow the said villages, and the proceeds thereof, to be managed, used, dealt with, and applied accordingly (168). The rules applicable to strict accounts between trustees and cestui que trusts that exist in England ought not to be applied without qualification in India, because in truth there are a number of fiduciary relationships in India to which these rules cannot in their entirety apply. This does not mean that breach of established duty should be less severely dealt with in India than in this country, but that there are fiduciary relationships which do not involve all the duties which are imposed upon trustees here. The office of manager of a joint family estate affords an illustration of this difference (287). (Sir Johd Edge.) PERRAZU v. SUBBARAYUDU. All are agreed that the alienation of any portion of the joint estate, without such express or implied authority, may be impeached by the co-parceners, and that such an authority will be implied, at least in the case of minors, if it can be shown that the alienation was made by the managing member of the family for legitimate family purposes. The presumption is that a bond held in the name of the managing member of a joint Hindu family is joint property; and it is for those who assert the contrary to make good their case.

Proof that some of the members of the family had private transactions by no means proves that the particular bond in question was the private property of the manager in whose name it was held.

Where the appellants alleged that a bond held in the name of R, the manager of a joint Hindu family, was the separate property of R, held, on the facts, that they failed to displace the presumption in favour of joint ownership. (Viscount Cave.) BANDHU RAM v. CHINTAMAN SINGH.

The suit was brought by the grand-nephews of one D deceased against a dancing-girl to recover possession of a house, asserting that the plaintiffs and D had formed a joint family, that the house in question was bought out of family money and had become joint family property; but that it had been improperly transferred by D, in the exercise of his power as karta or manager of the family property to the dancing-girl. The defence set up by the dancing-girl was that the house was her own, bought out of the proceeds of her own money and jewels.

Held, on the evidence, reversing the appellate Court and restoring the trial Judge, that the plaintiffs had failed to prove that the house was the property of D, or of the joint family of which he was a member. Joint Family—Manager—Contract for sale of family property by—Specific Performance of—Suit for.

———Earnest-money with interest—Claim against heirs of manager for—Amendment of plaint so as to set up—Appeal—Permissibility for first time in.

The plaintiff sued the members of a joint Hindu family for specific performance of an agreement for the sale of family property alleged to have been made by one of them, the karta of the family, or, in the alternative, for damages for breach thereof, such damages being assessed at the earnest-money paid with interest from date of agreement to date of realisation. The trial Judge dismissed the suit, holding (1) that the agreement was not proved to be genuine and to be supported by consideration, and (2) that the contract was not binding on the other members of the family, because it was not shown to have been entered into for the benefit of the defendant's family or to have been necessary as an act of prudent management. Pending an appeal to the High Court by the plaintiff, the karta, defendant No (1) died, and the suit title was amended by adding as his heirs his son and grandsons, who were already parties. At the hearing of the appeal to the High Court the plaintiff gave up his claim for specific performance. The High Court found the agreement to be genuine and to be supported by consideration to the extent of the earnest money alleged to have been paid, and passed a decree against all the defendants for the repayment of the earnest-money with interest. The High Court failed to consider the question whether the contract was binding on the other members of the family, which the trial Judge had found against.

Held that, even if the conclusions of fact of the High Court were well-founded, its decree could not be supported, and the suit ought to be dismissed in its entirety (59-60).

The suit was framed as an ordinary suit for specific performance of an agreement, with an alternative claim for damages for breach thereof. The amendment of the cause title in the appeal before the High Court on the death of Defendant No. 1 did not alter the nature of the suit. Nor did the abandonment of the claim for specific performance at the hearing of that appeal alter the suit as framed into an action for money had and received, or for the recovery of a debt. The plaint cannot, at this stage, be allowed to be amended so as to make the suit one of that nature, because the defendants must have an opportunity to rebut such new cause of action, and that course would involve fresh written statements and a fresh trial (59-60). ———Improvident and non-binding nature of sale against other members—Plea of, by subsequent purchaser impleaded in suit—Maintainability.

A suit for the specific performance of a contract to sell property owned by a joint Hindu family was brought against the father and managing member of the family and against two persons who claimed that they had purchased the property under a subsequent contract and who denied the existence and validity of the plaintiff's contract. The High Court held that the plea that the plaint contract was an improvident sale was not open to the subsequent purchasers. On appeal to the Privy Council it was contended on their behalf that under the purchase they acquired all the rights of the family and could use, therefore, any defence open to any members of the family.

Their Lordships were not satisfied that the High Court were right in holding that the plea of improvidence was not open to the subsequent purchasers, but they did not feel it necessary to pronounce upon the point. (Lord Phillimore.) SHEIKH NASIR-UD-DIN v. AHMAD HUSAIN.

The father of the appellants sued the respondents claiming that certain land was in his ownership and under his management, and praying for an injunction restraining the respondents from interfering with his possession. His case was that the respondents were not legitimate members of the family, and that, in any event, they had lost their right in the joint family property by exclusion. His pleas were found against; it was held that the respondents were legitimate members of the family and that there had been no exclusion, and the suit of the appellant's father was dismissed.

The appellants subsequently instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose, raising the same pleas. They contended that they were not bound by the decision in their father's suit, on the ground that they were not parties to it and were then minors, and that their father had not sued on behalf of the family with due care.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Joint Family—Manager—Decree against—(Contd.)

Held, that the appellant's father having in the prior suit acted on behalf of himself and his minor children to try to exclude a collateral branch from a share of the family property and having failed, the appellants were, under S. 11, Expl. VI of C. P. C. of 1908, bound by the decision in the prior suit, and were precluded from instituting a fresh suit raising the same question.

In the case of an Hindu family where all have rights, it is impossible to allow each member of the family to litigate the same point over and over again, and each infant to wait till he becomes of age, and then bring an action, or bring an action by his guardians before; and in each of these cases, therefore, the Court looks to the Explanation VI of S. 11 of C. P. C. of 1908, to see whether or not the leading member of the family has been acting either on behalf of minors in their interest, or if they are majors, with the assent of the majors. If the appellant's father had succeeded in the prior suit, the judgment therein would have enured for the benefit of the appellants, and, as he has failed, they must take the consequences. There are occasions, including foreclosure suits, when the managers of a joint Hindu family so effectively represent all other members of the family that the family as a whole is bound.

Where in a suit for redemption instituted by some of the members of a joint Hindu family the mortgagee raised the plea that the suit was not maintainable by reason of foreclosure decree absolute obtained by him against persons who were at all material times in the foreclosure suit the managers of the joint family of which the plaintiffs were members and it appeared that in the foreclosure proceedings the said managers acted in every way in the interests of the family itself and that at the time of the said proceedings the mortgagee had no notice of the plaintiffs' interests and no question therefore arose under S. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, held that the foreclosure decree was binding on plaintiffs, though they were not parties to the proceedings in which the decree was passed, and the suit was therefore not maintainable. ———Mortgage decree—Sale in execution of, and purchase by mortgagee himself—Suit by junior members for declaration that their right of redemption had not been extinguished by said decree and sale—Maintainability—Suit based on sole ground of their non-representation in prior suit.

A mortgage decree was obtained against J, the manager of a Mithakshara joint Hindu family, his two brothers, and his two sons, on foot of a mortgage of joint family property executed by J. In execution of that decree the mortgaged property was sold and was purchased by the mortgagee himself. The sale proceeds being insufficient, a decree was obtained under S. 90 of the Transfer of Property Act, and, in execution thereof, other property of the family was sold and was purchased also by the mortgagee himself. The two sons of J were minors at the date of that suit but were sued in their own names as being majors.

In a suit brought by the said sons of J, for a declaration that their right of redemption had not been extinguished by the decree in the prior suit or by the sales in execution thereof, they admitted the binding character of the mortgage sued upon in the prior suit and of the decree therein. They did not impeach the decree therein, or the sales in execution thereof. The only ground on which they rested their claim was that they were not duly represented in the prior suit, not being represented therein by duly appointed guardians ad litem.

Held, that the suit was unsustainable.

While the decree for sale stands and sale has taken place under it, the right to redeem is extinguished unless the sale be set aside. After the sale has taken place the owner holds as purchaser, and is entitled to raise all the defences that belong to him as such, and unless the claim to set aside the sale is made in a properly constituted action and properly raised in suitable pleadings in that action, the Court cannot interfere with the possession which has been given him by the purchase (98). ———Sale in execution of—Interest passing under—Mortgage of family property, and not of manager's share only, for family debt—Suit on, for recovery of amount by sale of mortgaged property itself—Sale in execution of decree in—Junior members not impleaded in suit.

The managers of a joint Hindu trading family mortgaged a portion of the family property, and not merely their shares therein, for the purpose of paying a debt due from their firm, On that mortgage a suit was instituted against the mortgagors alone, but the plaint therein claimed the recovery of the mortgage debt and interest out of the mortgaged property. The mortgagee obtained a decree in that suit, and, in execution thereof, he applied for the seizure and sale of the mortgaged property itself, and not merely of the right, title, and interest of the mortgagors therein. That application was granted, and, at the sale held in execution, the whole property was sold, as appeared from the certificate of sale, and purchased by the mortgagee himself.

The court below, while of opinion that the mortgage and the proceedings on foot thereof were calculated to convey the entirety of the property, and not merely the mortgagor's share therein, nevertheless held that the shares of the other members did not pass by the sale, on the sole ground that they had not been made parties to the suit on the mortgage.

Held that the mere fact of the non-joinder of the other members in the suit was not an absolute bar to their interest passing by the sale, and that, in the circumstances of the

In a suit by the purchaser of a joint family property sold in execution of a decree obtained against the manager alone for a declaration that, under his execution purchase, he acquired also the shares of the defendants, the other members of the family, in the property sold, and for recovery of possession of such shares, the plaintiff offered to prove the facts necessary to make the mortgage valid and binding upon the defendants, and that the sale was of the entirety of the property, and not merely of the shares of the mortgagor therein. The defendants declined to have those questions tried, and made their stand in the courts below upon the sole ground of their not having been made parties to the suit or to the execution proceedings.

Held that, under the circumstances, the defendants were not entitled to have a remand of the case to enable them to have an opportunity of proving that the mortgage was not valid and binding upon them (197) (Sir Barnes Peacock.) DOULUT RAM v. MEHR CHAND. (1887) 14 I. The mere non-joinder of the junior members of a joint Hindu family in a suit against the manager on a mortgage bond executed by him is not conclusive of the fact that the shares of the other members did not pass by the sale held in execution of the decree passed in such suit. If the mortgage was valid and binding upon the other members, the entire property could be sold, even if they were no parties to the suit. All that the other members can claim is that, not being parties to the sale or execution prceedings, they ought not to be barred from trying the fact or the nature of the debt in a suit of their own, or in a suit brought by the execution purchaser against them for the recovery of the property purchased by him. But such a right would avail them nothing unless they could prove that the debt was not such as to justify the sale (196-7). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) DOULUT RAM v. MEHR CHAND. (1887) 14 I. The manager of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mithakshara law, and consisting of himself, his son, and a minor grandson, that son's son, executed a deed of gift giving the entire family property to the minor grandson then in existence and to other grandsons that might be born thereafter. The deed was executed with the consent of the son obtained for valuable consideration, and in order to save the ancestral estate from being wasted by the son. Possession was given to the minor grandson then in existence, through his mother, who was by the deed appointed his guardian.

It was said that the gift was made to a class, viz., grandsons of the executant, and that, inasmuch as some of the class, the after-born grandsons, could not take, even the grandson in existence at the date of the deed could not take.

Held that it was not necessary to view the transaction as though it were to be determined by rules of construction drawn from English law and applicable to English deeds of gift (178-9).

The transaction is a family arrangement, partaking so far of the nature of a partition that the son receives a portion and is thenceforth totally excluded, and quoad ultra, the grandfather surrenders his interest to his grandson, who on a complete partition among the whole family would be entitled to one-fourth. Now in such an arrangement it would be quite consistent with Hindu ideas of ancestral property to express a desire that the whole generation into which the property was transferred should benefit by it. The notions present to the mind of the head of a joint Hindu family who is making a family arrangement, are something very different from the notions present to the mind of an English testator when he makes a gift to a class (178-9). Held that, assuming that the deed was intended to express a gift to the grandsons that might be born thereafter, which could not take effect as such, the grandson then in existence took the whole, and that in any event the property covered by the deed effectually passed away from the grandfather and his son (177-8).

The paramount intention was to get rid of the son by passing the property to his sons That intention is much more readily effectuated by giving the property to the grandson then in existence than by holding that the deed and all that followed upon it, the mutation of names, the possession and management of the mother of the grandson then in existence, did not operate any change at all. In the present case, there is every reason for holding that, if the after-born grandsons are not able to take by virtue of the gift, the grandson then in existence shall take the whole. Their Lordships hold that the circumstance that the parties wished to do something beyond their legal power, and that they have used unskilful language in the deed of gift, ought not to invalidate that important fact of their plan which is consistent with one construction of the deed, and is clearly proved from the transfer of the property in fact (177-8). ———Grandsons in existence and to be born—Gift of entire family property to, to save it from being wasted by son—Nature of—Family arrangement partaking of nature of partition—Money payment to son in lieu of his share and his assent to gift.

The Manager of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mithahkshara law, and consisting of himself, his son, and his minor grandson, the son of that son, executed a deed of gift giving away the whole of the family property to the minor grandson then in existence and to other grandsons who might be born thereafter. The son accepted in lieu of his share in the ancestral estate a sum of money for the payment of debts incurred by him; and he consented to the deed of gift and to the transfer of property thereby made. Possession was given to the minor grandson then in existence, through his mother, who was by the deed of gift appointed his guardian. The deed of gift was executed in order to save the ancestral estate from being wasted by the son.

Held, that the transaction was a family arrangement partaking so far of the nature of a partition that the son received a portion and was thereforth totally excluded and quoad ultra the grandfather surrendered his interest to his grand son, who on a complete partition among the whole family would be entitled to one-fourth (178-9).

The transaction cannot strictly be a partition, for, according to the Mithakshara, there can be no partition directly between grandfather and grandson while the father is alive (179). thereafter, to save the ancestral estate from the consequences of the continued extravagance of U, his son. After the death of the grandfather, the appellant, who had obtained a decree for money against U, got the properties comprised in the deed of gift attached and advertised for sale in execution. The attachment was, however, raised at the instance of the mother of S, who set up his claim under the said deed of gift.

In a suit instituted thereupon by the appellant to avoid the said deed of gift, on the ground that it was executed merely to defeat the right of the creditors, and to make the lands comprised in the deed available to answer debts of U, held, that, as the creditors had no charge on U's share in the family property, it was not for the defendant, S, to show purchase for value without notice, in order to retain the property comprised in the deed of gift, and that, on the contrary, the appellant must allege and prove that the deed was intended to defeat, and had the effect of defeating, U's creditors (176).

All that the defendant, S, has to show is that the transfer was made in good faith and for consideration (176). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse.) RAI BISHEN CHAND v. ASMAIDA KOER. (1884) 11 I.A.164 = 6 A. 560 (571-2) = 4 Sar. 512.

———Member of family—Gift of entire family property to one, to save it from the extravagance of another—Validity—Consent of latter for consideration—Effect — Avoidance of gift—Right of his creditors as to.

A joint Hindu family governed by the Mithakshara law consisted of M, U, his only son, and S, the minor son of U, by his wife A. To save the ancestral estate from being wasted by the extravagance of U, M, the head of the family, executed a registered deed of gift giving the whole of the family properties to S, and his brothers who might be born thereafter. The deed was executed with the consent of U, obtained for valuable consideration. U was a party to the gift. Mutation of names was effected in the name of S, minor under the guardianship of A. S died a few months afterwards, and the estates were thereupon transferred into the name of A, as his heir, without opposition. The consideration paid to U, for obtaining his consent to the deed of gift approached, if it did not equal, the whole value of his then share.

Held, that the transfer, having been made in good faith and for good consideration, the property comprised in the deed of gift effectually passed away from M and U, and that it could not be avoided by the creditors of U, whether or not they were paid (176, 180).

Even if the amount paid to U, for obtaining his consent came from the joint chest, it is an application by the head and manager of the family of a large share of the family property to the separate purpose of one member, who was indulging his inclinations apart from the family. That is a substantial consideration (175-6).

The document in fact shows valuable consideration approaching, if not equalling, the whole value of U's then share. And, though M seems to have taken the precaution to see that portions of the Rs. 5,000 actually reached the hands of U's. creditors, he was not bound to do that, because they were general creditors, and had no lien upon the property. It would place these joint families in a very unforunate predicament if they could never buy out a vicious member who threatens their ruin, so long as any of his creditors remains unpaid (176). A father and his infant son constituted the whole of a joint family living under the Mithakshara law. The father was extravagant and embarrassed, and to save the ancestral estate he executed a deed of gift to the infant son, coupled with a declaration that if any other sons should be born to him they should from the date of their birth acquire equal right in the property. The High Court held that, even if the gift was void against the father's creditors, it was binding and operative as between the parties to the instrument, and that from the moment of its execution the father ceased to have any joint interest in the family estate.

N. B. This point does not appear in the report of the case either in the Indian Appeals or in the Indian Law Reports and is taken from L. R. 11 I. A. 164 at 179-80, where it is referred to as illustrating the notions present to the minds of Hindus when making arrangements of ancestral property.

The notions present to the mind of the head of a joint Hindu family who is making a family arrangement are something very different from the notions present to the mind of an English testator when he makes a gift to a class. Though there was a similar gift made from a similar motive in the case in L. R. 11 I. A. 26, it did not occur to anybody to contend that the deed of gift was void, except as a fraud upon creditors. be in excess of the necessity and therefore in excess ot the authority. Excess of the necessity of course relates to terms that are available, because, if you must borrow and therefore must pay interest, it cannot be in excess of the authority on that occasion to pay the terms that are necessary, when more moderate terms are not available. "Commercial terms" is obviously a relative expression. They are relative to the time and the place, the country and the part of the country, where the money is borrowed, the kind of security that is offered for the loan, the possibilities of realising such security, the supply of capital and the opportunities of finding persons willing to lend for possibly a considerable time. They cannot be confined, as in this country they might be confined, to something connected with a publicly announced and official rate of interest for loans generally, or to a current rate generally allowed upon the highest security in financial transactions, such as an issue of debentures, or to something regulated by the day to day supply of money and by facilities for short loans. Their Lordships think that the word "commercial" must be understood, in a case like this, of a community, which is not a commercial community, and of transactions which no one would call mercantile, as a comprehensive but convenient term for such terms as can be arranged freely between borrower and lender under the circumstances of the particular case. The whole conditions and terms of the lending have to be regarded together. There is uo rule, which their Lordships can discover, which binds them, when the terms of a loan are challenged, to lean to their reduction, or to presume that simple interest must always be judicially preferable to compound interest, or that rates, because they might seem high here, must be unreasonable in India. Compound interest is common and may often be necessary and proper in India under the circumstances of that country. The suit was to enforce a mortgage bond executed by the karta of a joint Hindu family for a principal sum of Rs. 12,000, with compound interest at 15 per cent. per annum with yearly rests. No question was raised by the other members as to the necessity for the borrowing itself. The only question was as to the necessity for the terms, namely, the rate of interest and the rests and the compound interest.

The evidence adduced by the mortgagee, which was uncontradicted, was to the effect that the loan in question was raised to clear off prior mortgages which had been entered into in the previous two or three years with a local bank on even more onerous terms, that is, on compound interest at a rate higher than 15 per cent. with six-monthly rests.

The Courts below concurrently found that the interest and the terms of the loan were brought within the karta's authority as being such terms as it was reasonable and proper for him to incur at the time and under the circumstances, for the purpose of obtaining the loan.

The argument before the Privy Council was that such evidence as the mortgagee gave, even if a prima facie discharge of the onus on him, ought to be disregarded in view of the decisions of the Privy Council in (1) L.R. 46 I.A. 145; (2) L.R. 50 I.A. 14; (3) L.R. 51 I.A. 278; the contention being that the Board had in those three cases ruled that compound interest was in excess of the karta's powers regardless of the evidence in and of the facts and circumstances of each particular case and ought therefore not to be enforced, notwithstanding that the evidence in the case showed that the terms on which the loan in question was obtained were reasonable and proper terms in the circumstances of the case.

Held, overruling the contention, that the decisions relied on did not lay down any such hard and fast rule, and that, in view of the evidence that was given in the case, enough was proved to discharge the onus of proof on the mortgagee, and to justify a decree in favour of the mortgagee when no evidence in answer was given. A plea of no necessity for a loan raised by the manager of a joint Hindu family on the security of joint family property, and that the property is not at all liable for the payment of the amount claimed, opens the door for a defendant to say that the rate of interest is excessive, and places on the plaintiff (mortgagee) the onus of proving that the rate of interest is not excessive, having regard to all the circumstances which prevailed when the loan was made. In cases in which the question arises as to the terms of borrowing and rates of interest, which would be within the authority of the Karta of a joint Hindu family, the Board will not presume in default of evidence to lay down for itself that judicial notice should be taken of the terms of borrowing and rates of interest, which would be within the authority of the Karta, but will be content, in each case, to accept the decision of the local Court as being at any rate better informed on such a subject than their Lordships can be. The importance of the experience of the Indian Court in supplying their Lordships' lack of knowledge is equally great, whether that Court reduces the terms of the loan or maintains them. There is no rule which binds their Lordships, when the terms of a loan are challenged, to lean to their reduction, or to presume that simple interest must always be judicially preferable to compound interest, or that rates, because they might seem high here, must be unreasonable in India. A mortgage deed, to which the defendants, the junior members of a joint Hindu family, were parties, stated that the whole of their ancestral property was already mortgaged to the plaintiff. The mortgage deed to the plaintiff was executed, while the defendants were minors, by the manager of the family.

Semble: the statement in the second deed might be evidence against the defendants that the mortgage to the plaintiff was binding upon them, and that it included the entire property mortgaged, and not merely the mortgagor's share therein (192-3). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) DOULAT RAM v. MEHR CHAND. (1887) 14 I. A. 187 = 15 C. 70 (77) = 5 Sar. 84 = 1 P. R. 1888.

———Binding character of mortgage on—Mortgage for discharge of debts binding on junior member but executed as sole proprietor—Statement in deed that executant was in ancestral possession of mortgaged property.

In a mortgage bond deed executed by the managers of a joint Hindu family, the mortgagors stated that they held ancestral possession of the mortgaged property, that it was purchased and built by them and that they owned it to the exclusion of every one else. The debt for which the bond was executed was stated in the bond to be a debt due by the firm, the proprietors of which were the executants of the bond and the other members of the joint family.

Held, that though the mortgagors stated that they were the sole proprietors, the statement that they were in ancestral possession showed that they intended to mortgage the whole of what they held as ancestral property, and that the mortgage passed the whole of the property which they professed to mortgage (191-2). ———Binding character of mortgage on—Mortgage for discharge of father's debts but executed not as manager of joint Hindu family but as absolute owner of impartible estate.

A mortgage deed purported to have been made between Sheoraj, mortgagor, of the first part, Maharaj, his only brother, of the second part, and the Bank of Upper India, Ltd., of the third part. Sheoraj was the sole mortgagor, and by the deed of mortgage, he, declaring himself to be absolute owner in possession of the property comprised in the deed and that there was no sharer in the said property, purported to mortgage the same to the Bank. Maharaj was not a mortgagor, nor did it appear by the mortgage deed that he had any proprietary interest in the mortgaged property or was obtaining any benefit from the loan to his brother.

Maharaj, who was a minor at the date of the mortgage deed, was made a party thereto in order that the fact of his having signed the deed might afford evidence that he had assented to the taking of the loan by his brother and the granting of the mortgage (113).

The property comprised in the mortgage deed was in fact the ancestral property of the joint Hindu family which at the date of the mortgage consisted of Sheoraj and Maharaj; and the amount advanced under the mortgage was borrowed by Sheoraj to discharge the debts which had been contracted by their father and was applied by Sheoraj to the discharge of those debts. It appeared, however, that Sheoraj, after the death of his father, assumed without authority title of Raja, and asserted that the family estate was impartible, and as an impartible estate had descended to him as the elder son of his father, and that his brother Maharaj was entitled only to maintenance, and that it was in that assumed position as the absolute owner of an impartible estate, and not as manager of a joint Hindu family, that he obtained the loan from the Bank, and made the mortgage in favour of the Bank.

Held, that as Sheoraj did not make the mortgage as manager of a joint Hindu family but made it as the absolute owner of an impartible estate and the Bank took it from him as such owner, and as the discharge of the father's debts by Sheoraj with the money raised by the mortgage was made by him in his own interests, and not as representing Maharaj, the latter's interest in the mortgaged property was not liable for the mortgage debt (117-8). ———Minor member—Validity of mortgage against—Certificate of guardianship of minor's property—Person obtaining—Joint execution of deed by, without sanction of court—Effect.

A mortgage deed in respect of the property of an undivided Mitakshara family was executed by K and J, the adult members of the family, and by Mussumat L, as guardian of the third member, who, on the face of the mortgage deed appeared to be a minor. K was admittedly the Karta of the joint family. It appeared that Mussumat L had obtained a certificate of guardianship (presumably of property) as regards the minor member. The mortgage was executed for purposes which would make it binding on all the members of the family.

In a suit brought to enforce the mortgage, it was contended that the mortgage was mortgage of a guardian, and that, inasmuch as Mussumat L, had not admittedly obtained the sanction of the court for making the mortgage, it was invalid for want of such sanction. The High Court in India upheld that contention.

Held, that the view of the High Court was wrong (170). Their Lordships think that the mortgage under consideration was not a mortgage by the guardian, assuming the mother to have been a guardian, but a mortgage by the family, entered into by the karta of the family with the concurrence of J, the only other adult member of the family (170). A mortgage of the property of an undivided Mitakshara family was executed by K, the then karta of the family, J, and L, as the mother and guardian of a minor member. It appeared that L had been appointed guardian of J also, with the possible result that he was also a minor by reason of Act IX of 1875, S. 3, at the time of the mortgage. But he was at that time of full age according to the general Hindu law, and he executed the mortgage himself as a person of full age. He was of full age at the date of the suit brought to enforce the mortgage. Necessity was not established for a portion of the mortgage money.

Held, that the onus was on J to shew the grounds, if any, for exempting him from liability, and that he, having failed to do so, was liable personally for the portion of the mortgage money not shown to have been advanced for binding purposes (170-1). A mortgage of joint estate made by the manager of the property, who is not the father of the other members of the joint family, can only be justified so far as it is wanted for the joint family purposes. If the necessity cannot be established by direct evidence it may be assumed, if it can be shown that reasonable care was taken to ascertain if such circumstances existed and the transferee acted in good faith (S. 38 of the Transfer of Property Act). In either case the burden of proof lies on the person who claims the benefit of the mortgage. There is no difference between the burden of proof when it is desired to support a mortgage made by a manager of a joint estate and that which is required to support the mortgage made, for example, by a widow who has only a similar limited power of disposition. A sale deed in respect of joint family property executed by the manager of the family and the mother of the minor members as their guardian contained a covenant by them both to indemnify the vendors in full should they suffer loss by reason of the minors putting forward a claim after attaining majority. The High Court regarded the insertion of that clause as a circumstance throwing suspicion on the validity of the alienation as against the minors.

Held that the clause might have been no more than a reasonable precaution against the undoubted risk that the vendors who were majors might afterwards make common cause with the vendors who were minors and endeavour by suppressio veri and suggestio falsi to get the sale set aside (214-5). ———Joint Family property — Presumption—Onus of proof.

Two brothers, who were members of a joint Hindu family, separated, but there was no regular partition of the estate. The effect of the separation was that the lands remained undivided, but each brother, being no longer a member of a joint Hindu family, took his share of the rents. The younger brother had then a large claim against the elder brother, who had been the manager of the estate, in respect of the rents and profits received previous to the partition. After a period of eleven months, the brothers re-united, and, on the re-union, a putni which had been purchased by the elder brother during the period of separation and, indeed all the properties of the brothers, were thrown into the joint fund. The brothers again separated, and the elder brother thereupon brought a suit against the younger brother for the recovery of the moiety of the price paid for the putni, on the ground that it had been advanced from out of the elder brother's private funds.

Held, that, in the absence of proof by the elder brother that the price had been paid by him from out of his private funds, he was not entitled to recover (411).

It is not even alleged upon these proceedings, that the parties originally had any separate property; the presumption of Hindu law is, that property not shown to be separate is joint; and it is an admitted fact that the plaintiff was long in the management of the joint estate, had received the collections from it, and was accountable for them to his younger brother. And if the moneys employed in the purchase of the putni formed part of those so drawn from the joint estate, it follows that the younger brother on the re-union was entitled, upon the general principles of Hindu Law, to share

The head and managing member of a joint Hindu family kept one account of the income of his ancestral and self-acquired property (obtained as a reward for services rendered to the Government in the Indian Mutiny) and treated the income of both kinds of property as one amalgamated fund. No distinction was made by him between the income derived from the different classes of property and the whole of the income was thrown into one common stock and was devoted to the expenditure of the whole of the joint family. There was nothing to indicate that he wished to or did treat the property acquired by him as his separate property. Held, that the property acquired by the managing member as his self-acquired property had, by his conduct, become the property of the joint family and could not be disposed of by him by will without the consent of the other members of the family. A portion of joint family property bequeathed by will by the head and managing member of a joint Hindu family was bequeathed to the widow of a deceased member of the family to enure for her life. She would under the Hindu law have been entitled to maintenance from out of the joint family property. At a partition made after the death of the manager between the surviving members of the family the property bequeathed to the said widow was not dealt with. From that circumstance it was sought to draw the inference that the will of the managing member was made with the consent of the family.

Held, that the inference was not one which could properly be drawn.

The omission to include that property in the partition was probably owing to the reluctance of the members of the family to interfere during the widow's lifetime with what was certainly the wishes of their ancestor, the manager. It is also to be observed that the widow was entitled to maintenance. (Sir John Edge.) INDAR SAHAI v. KUNWAR SHAIAM BAHADUR. (1912) 13 M. L. T. 156 = 1913 M.W.N. 122 = 17 C. L. Joint Family—Manager—Zemindary land of family—Creation of new Zirat land out of.

———Validity of.

S was the head of a joint Hindu family of Zemindars, governed by the Mitakshara law. He executed, what was loosely called, a deed of gift in favour of his only son, R. There were other members of the family beside S and R. By that deed he recited that among other family properties there was an 8 annas share in Mouzah N and he conveyed by gift to his son all his rights and interests in that and other properties and then declared that—

"400 rupees per month . . . shall continue to be paid to me .... for defraying the expenses of the maintenance of me, the declarant, and for meeting my personal expenses, and, over and above that, 150 bighas of land by measurement, situate in Mouzah P, or in any other Mouzah, shall remain in my possession and occupancy as Zirat land, and the measurement and the demarcation of the boundaries thereof shall be made as soon as possible, and the said land shall be held by me in my possession as Zirat without paying any rent therefor."

Quaere, whether S had, as head of a joint family, any right to make such an arrangement, although no separation of the family had taken place, nor had its properties been divided, or to create a new Zirat land out of that which had been theretofore merely part of the Zemindary land of his family. Joint Family—Member of—Alienation by—(Contd.)

There can be little doubt that all alienations by one co-parcener of his share in undivided property, whether voluntary or compulsory, are inconsistent with the strict theory of a joint and undivided Hindu family ; and the law as established in Madras and Bombay has been one of gradual growth, founded upon the equity which a purchaser for value has to be allowed to stand in his vendor's shoes, and to work out his rights by means of a partition (102). Whenever an attempt is made to extend the doctrine of the alienability by a co-parcener of his undivided share beyond the decided cases, the question is, not so much whether an admitted principle of Hindu law shall be carried out to its apparently logical consequences, as what are the limits of an exceptional doctrine established by modern jurisprudence (195). ———Right of—Law in different Presidencies as to—Alienation for value—Alienation by gift—Distinction.

It has been settled law in the Presidency of Madras that one co-parcener may dispose of ancestral undivided estate, even by contract and conveyance to the extent of his own share (101-2).

The same law now obtains in the Presidency of Bombay. But it appears that, in order to support the alienation by one co-parcener of his share in undivided property, the alienation must be for value. The Madras Courts, on the other hand, seem to have gone so far as to recognise an alienation by gift (102).

In Bengal, however, the law which prevails in the other Presidencies as regards alienation by private deed has not yet been adopted. In a leading case on the subject, that Court held that, according to the Mitakshara law as received in the Presidency of Fort William, one co-parcener had no authority without the consent of his co-sharers to mortgage his undivided share in a portion of the joint family estate, in order to raise money on his own account, and not for the benefit of the family (102-3). indefinite, he is not in a position to dispose of it, at his own hand, and for his own purposes ; but, as soon as partition is made, he becomes the sole owner of his share, and has the same powers of disposal as if it had been his acquired property. Actual partition is not in all cases essential. An agreement by the members of an undivided family to hold the joint property individually in definite shares, or the attachment of a member's undivided share in execution of a decree at the instance of his creditor, will be regarded as sufficient to support the alienation of a member's interest in the estate, or a sale under the execution (196-7). The rights of co-parceners in an undivided Hindu family governed by the law of the Mitakshara to impeach an alienation made by one member of the family without their authority, express or implied, has of late years been frequently before the Courts of India, and it cannot be said that there has been complete uniformity of decision respecting it (101). ———Validity of—Alienation made on member's own account and without consent of co-sharers—Wholly invalid under N. W. P. Mitakshara.

Under the well-known rule of the Mitakshara (N.W. Provinces), as clearly laid down in Sahu Ram's Case, joint family property "cannot be the subject of a gift, sale or mortgage by one co-parcener except with the consent, express or implied, of all the other co-parceners. Any deed of gift, sale or mortgage granted by one co-parcener on his own account of or over the joint family property is invalid ; the estate is wholly unaffected by it, and it stands entirely free of it." This law has been, in substance, repeated again and again. It is in entire accord with the ancient texts. The exception to this rule is where the consideration for the transaction is an antecedent debt of the vendor or mortgagor. (Lord Shaw.) CHET RAM v. RAM SINGH. (1922) 49 I. ment and maintenance of a dhurmasala in Bombay for the benefit of Sadhoos and Saints. The plaintiff-respondent was one of the trustees named in the will. The defendant-appellant was the son of the testator's only brother, who was dead at the date of the will. Either as heir or as the residuary devisee and legatee of his uncle, the testator, the appellant was entitled to the whole residue of the testator's property. He contended that the property of which the testator was in possession during his lifetime was joint family property, and that under the provisions of the Mitakshara law the testator had no power of disposing of it to the dhurmasala or other charitable objects indicated by his will.

The will of R stated that the appellant had a right of inheritance to the whole of his (R's) moveable and immoveable property ; and provided that when he attained the age of 21 years the executors appointed in the will should entrust to the appellant the whole of the testator's property, moveable and immoveable that might remain after defraying the expenses agreeably to all the conditions stated in the will. As regards the dhurmasala, the will provided that the management thereof should be conducted by the executors appointed in the will up to the time the appellant attained the age of 21 years, and that after he attained the age of 21 years the executors and the appellant should jointly conduct the management of the charity.

After the testator's death, a specific part of his estate was set apart by the executors to answer the charitable trusts created by his will, and, after the appellant attained the age of majority, the residue of the testator's estate was made over to him. Further as part of the same arrangement a deed was executed, the parties to which were the executors who proved and acted of the first part, and the appellant of the second part. That deed recited that the appellant was satisfied with the management and administration of the testator's estate by the executors, that they being willing to make over and assign to him the estates and property of the testator remaining in their hands, not subject to charitable and other trusts, the appellant had agreed to receive the same, and to execute the release absolving them from any manner of liability in respect of the administration of the estate of the testator. The appellant not only released the executors from such liability, but agreed to become, and did become, joint trustee of the trusts and charities, including the charity in question.

Held, affirming the High Court, that even if the testator had not such an ownership of the property as entitled him to devote a lac of rupees to the charity in question, the effect of the transactions referred to above, was to make a valid dedication of the property set apart to the charity in question (94). Joint Family—Member of—Debt personal of—Decree for, against his widow as legal representative—Sale of his share in joint family property in execution of.

———Binding nature of decree and of sale against surviving members.

In this case, one of the questions referred by the Division Bench of the High Court to the consideration of the Full Bench was :—

B, a member of a Hindu family living under the Mitakshara law. and having joint family property, died entitled to an undivided share in such property, and leaving two widows him surviving. After the death of C, his widows were sued in their representative capacity in respect of debts incurred by him in his lifetime on his own account, and not for the benefit of the joint family, and decrees were obtained against the widows in that capacity. In execution of one or more of these decrees, an interest in certain portions of the joint family property, to the extent of the share to which B was entitled in his lifetime, has been sold by auction, and the purchasers have taken possession. Can the nephew of B, who is one of the surviving members of the joint family, recover from the purchasers possession of the interests which they have purchased, or any part of them ?

The Full Bench unanimously answered that question in the affirmative. The result of their opinion was thus expressed by the Chief Justice :—" I think, therefore, that this property, not being the property of the widows, and not being the property of the heirs of the deceased, could not be made available under the decree against the widows ; that if it could be made available at all for payment of the debts of the deceased, it must be in a suit against the survivors to charge the share of the deceased in the joint estate with the payment of the decree, by suing the survivors for the debt, and asking to have the deceased's share of the estate made available in the hands of the survivors to the same extent as that to which it would have been made available if the deceased had left a son and the estate had gone to him by inheritance, instead of to the survivors by survivorship. I think, then, that the question must be answered in the affirmative ; that the plaintiff has a right to sue the purchaser under the decree to recover back the estate, inasmuch as the property belongs to him, and the title of the purchaser under the decree against the widows is an invalid title (21-2)."

Held, that no objections could be urged to the answer given by the Full Bench (27). (Sir James W. Colvile.) MUSSUMAT PHOOLBAS KOONWAR v. LALLA JOGESHUR SAHOY. (1876) 3 I. A. 7 = 1 C. 226 (245) = 25 W. R. 285 = 3 Sar. 573 = 3 Suth. 236.

Joint Family—Member of—Deceased member—Share of, in joint property—Suit by one of surviving members to recover his share of.

———Maintainability—Conditions.

On the death of a childless Hindu, S, one of his two cousins, alleging that they and the deceased were joint in estate and that on the death of the latter they became entitled to his share by survivorship, sued the widows of the deceased and recovered possession of one moiety of the deceased's share in the joint family property. Subsequently the remaining half-share of the deceased in portions of the joint family property was seized and sold in execution of decrees obtained against his widows as representatives. Thereupon the other cousin of the deceased sued to recover

Held, that under the circumstances of the case the objection to the frame of the suit, viz., that it was a suit by one of the surviving members of a joint and undivided family for his separate share of the share of a deceased member in the joint property, was one of form rather than of substance, and that the suit ought not to have been dismissed on that ground (26-7). In lower Bengal, that is, under the law of the Dayabhaga, it is settled law that the right, title, and interest of one co-sharer in a joint estate may be attached and sold in execution to satisfy his personal debt; and that the purchaser under such an execution stands in the shoes of the judgment-debtor, and acquires the right as against the other co-sharers to compel a partition (251-2).

A similar rule prevails in the South of India, though the law there administered is founded on the Mithakshara. The law is to the same effect in the Presidency of Bombay (252).

DECREE AGAINST MEMBER IN REPRESENTATIVE CAPACITY.

———What amounts to—Sale of family property in execution of—Binding nature of, on other members.

A Hindu died, leaving a son. That son died subsequently, leaving two sons. M and C. Subsequent to his father's death, M was sued as the heir of his grandfather, and a decree was passed in that suit for the recovery of a sum of money on account of the rents of a certain mouzah, and it was stated that the grandfather had taken a lease of that mouzah from 1847 to 1854. It was further ordered that the decree was not to be executed against the person and self-acquired property of defendant, but against the property left by the deceased leaseholder, the grandfather. In execution of that decree the mouzah in respect of which the rent was due was sold.

It was found that the family was joint, that the grandfather, in taking the lease of the said mouzah, took it on behalf of the family, and the debt in respect of which the decree was passed was therefore a debt from the family, and that the mouzah in respect of which the rent was due and which was sold in execution of the decree was part of the joint family property.

Held, that M, must be deemed to have been sued as a representative of the family, that the decree was substantially a decree in respect of a joint debt of the family and against the representative of the family, and that it might be properly executed against the joint family property (236-7).

With respect to the order as to the execution, it appears to their Lordships that the fair construction of it—though it may not be drawn up with much accuracy—is that the decree is not to be executed against the self-acquired property of M, but against the family property which is there described as that left by the grandfather for the purpose of distinguishing it from the separate property which may have belonged to M. Looking to the substance of the case, it appears to their Lordships that the decree was a decree against the representative of the family in respect of a family debt, and that it is one which could be properly executed against the joint property of the family (237). ———Evidence.

G, R and P were brothers, and constituted a joint Hindu family governed by the ordinary law of Bengal. In 1877 P executed two deeds of endowment, or nirdes patras, one on the 24th of July and the other on the 12th of December. On the former of those dates the three brothers were entitled to a 12-anna share of a certain pergunnah which they held in patni. The question was whether P divested himself of his one third of the 12-anna share held in putni by the deeds of endowment executed by him.

It appeared that from the time of the execution of the deed of the 24th of July, 1877, until after the death of P, a period of about three years and three months, no change took place in the accounts, or in the management, or of dealing with the business or estates, or the proceeds thereof. No act was done by P or his brothers in which he was described as shebait.

Held, reversing the High Court and restoring the District Judge that it was not the intention of P or of his brothers that the deeds should be acted upon, or that P should thereby divest himself of his share of the property, and that the deeds were merely fictitious, or benami (116-7). The Subordinate Judge, who held that the properties dealt with by the deeds in question were joint family properties and that the deeds were therefore invalid, however, gave a judgment only in respect of five-sixths of the property, taking it that at the time of D's death, there were six members of the family, and being of opinion that D had therefore one-sixth share in the properties which he could pass by the deeds of gift.

PARTICIPATION IN.

———What amounts to.

It is not necessary for a member of an undivided family to prove possession of a specific share of the joint fund, nor participation in the profits of the joint property to the full extent of his share. It is very common among joint families that the expenses of the family are paid out of the common fund, and that each member draws a certain sum as he requires it, but there is no account taken between the members of the family to see whether each member receives his full share (63-4, 64-5). ———Profits of estate—Annual division of—Omission to prove—Effect.

The appellants sued to establish their right, as representatives of one branch of a joint and undivided Hindoo family, to their share in the family estate. Their right was disputed on the ground that they were not in fact members of the family at all ; and the parties went to trial upon these issues ; (1) "were the plaintiff, or his father, and the defendant, or his father, members of an undivided Hindoo family within the period of limitation ? (2) If so, what was the plaintiff's share ? (3) If not, has the plaintiff held possession of any share in the estate within the period of limitation ?"

The issues were all issues more or less of fact ; they were all found by the trial Judge and the lower appellate Court in favour of the appellants.

On special appeal, the Financial Commissioner reversed the decision of the lower Court, and dismissed the claim of the plaintiffs ; but he declared that the plaintiffs were entitled to maintenance in addition to the seer allowance which they were found to have received out of the estate.

Held, that the order of the Financial Commissioner could not be maintained.

There is no ground in the case on which it can properly be held that the ordinary consequences which under the Hindoo law would result to the appellants from the findings of the Courts below on the issues of fact, which were binding on the Financial Commissioner, ought not to follow upon those findings. There was really no issue in the case of any special custom which would take the enjoyment of this estate out of the ordinary Hindu Law.

The judgment of the Financial Commissioner may be based upon the opinion that the appellants had failed to prove such a division of profits as was required by law to establish their right as co-sharers in the estate. As it was not customary to give each sharer an account of his share of the profits every year, no safe inference could be drawn against the appellants from their omission to prove an annual division of profits. ———Validity of, against remaining member acquiring interest of mortgagor by purchases at execution sales — Mortgage made to raise money on member's own account and without consent of co-sharers—Bengal and N.-W. P. Mithakshara.

A joint Hindu family governed by the law of Mithakshara as administered in the North-Western Provinces consisted of a father and a son. The son executed a simple mortgage, whereby, in consideration of a sum of Rs. 93,000 received by him from the appellant, he pledged a 4-anna share owned by him under the Hindu law out of the 8-anna share of his father in the ancestral property, of which a detail was given at the end of the deed.

The appellant instituted a suit against the son and certain others on foot of the mortgage. The father, though not originally made a party, was subsequently added as a defendant. His defence was that he and his son were under the law of the Mithakshara, and that the mortgage deed was invalid; that out of the properties mentioned in the plaint the properties in the first schedule to the written statement were sold to the extent of the rights and interests of the son in execution of decrees held by third parties before the date of the plaintiff's mortgage bond sued on and were purchased by him with his own money in the name of his wife; that the rights of the son in the properties mentioned in the Second Schedule were purchased in good faith by him with his own money, some in his own name, some in the name of his wife, and some through his mokhtar. The whole of the purchases were made at sales by auction in execution of decrees, and it was found that the defendants were bona fide purchasers who had no notice or knowledge of the mortgage to the plaintiff. The main question in the case was whether the mortgage was valid, and created a charge which was to have priority over the purchases at the execution sales made bona fide and without notice of it.

Held, that the mortgage was invalid, and that the father was entitled to set up its invalidity (125-6).

In the case of Madho Parshad v. Mehrban Singh (L. R. 17 I. A. 194) it was held that, according to the Bengal Mithakshara law, a sale by a member of a Hindu family, without the consent of his co-parcener, of his undivided share in the family estate for his own benefit was invalid; that the surviving co-parcener was entitled to recover the property sold; and that the purchaser had not even an equity against the surviving co-parcener for the repayment of the purchase money. In the present case the interest of the son has passed to the father, not by survivorship, but by purchases at sales in execution of decrees. Although it is not the same interest as he would acquire by survivorship, it is sufficient to entitle him to set up the invalidity of the mortgage deed (125-6). Held, that the words in the power-of-attorney "or in respect of any mauza or share of land owned and possessed by us,...or make mortgage with possession" authorized the Am-Mokhtar to execute the suit mortgage bonds, each of which was for less than Rs. 4,000, but the aggregate amount of which exceeded Rs. 4,000, for debts for which the joint family was liable.

The mere fact that a member of a joint Hindu family, when trading on his separate account, was permitted by the family to appear to the world as the sole owner of joint family estates which stood in his sole name, and so, perhaps, to obtain a fictitious credit, can be no foundation for the defence that the other members of the family have thereby forfeited their right to assert their title to those estates as against a purchaser thereof in execution of a decree obtained against that member for his separate debt (845). ———Plea of—Onus of Proof in case of.

The appellants were the purchasers of the right, title, and interest of one R in the property in dispute in execution of a decree for his separate debt. The respondents were the other members of the joint family of which R was a member, and they claimed their shares in the said property on the ground that it was purchased by R with joint family funds and was therefore joint family property. It was held that they had established their case that the property was joint family property. But the appellants contended that the respondents had forfeited their right to assert their title against the appellants by reason of their own conduct, or the acts of any of those with whom they were connected.

Held that those who set up such a defence were bound to show clearly both the facts on which it was founded, and that the legal consequences on which they insisted necessarily flowed from those facts (844-5). (Sir James W. Colvile.) BODH SING DOODHOORIA v. GUNESCHUNDER SEN.

———Security to third party—Property in question given as, on false representation of its being separate property of member—Acceptance thereof by third party on faith of representation.

The appellants were the purchasers of certain property, which stood in the sole name of R, a member of a joint Hindu family but which was found to be really joint family property, in execution of a decree obtained against R for his separate debt. The respondents, the other members of the joint family, asserted their title to the property against the appellants. The question was whether the respondents had, by their conduct, forfeited their right to do so. The conduct relied upon for the purpose consisted in R having, probably with the concurrence of the adult members of the family, falsely represented that the property in question was his separate property and given it as security to the Collector who acted on the faith of that representation.

Held that such a false representation, though it might possibly have been used as an estoppel against the family, had any question in respect of the security arisen between them and the Collector, had no bearing upon the question as between the appellants and the respondents, except as an admission or as an instance of tortuous dealing, which

Held that A was not entitled to such share as a member of the joint family of K and his brothers, for, as the husband of a sister of K, he would not become a member of the joint family, nor would his share be inheritable by the members of the joint family according to the Mithakshara law (153).

———Female member entitled only to maintenance—Record in name of—Male member entitled to property in existence at the time—Effect.

In an ordinary case, the fact that one member of a joint Hindu family is recorded as proprietor of the joint property on behalf of the family is a circumstance of little moment. Where, however, the name in which the alleged joint property was recorded was that of a female (plaintiff's paternal uncle's wife), while, according to plaintiff's case, she had only a right to maintenance and the property should on the uncle's death have been recorded in the name of the plaintiff's father, the male member entitled, according to plaintiff, to the whole estate on the uncle's death, held that the recognition of the widow, apparently as sole proprietor, raised presumption against the case of joint possession and enjoyment set up by the plaintiff (529-30) (Sir Edward V. Williams.) JOWALA BAKSH v. DHARUM SINGH.

———Statement in proceeding that member is sole lambardar and that on his death property is to descend to his son, heir, or appointee—Effect.

Whenever property is, for whatever reasons, recorded in the sole name of one of several co-proprietors for fiscal purposes, it must obviously be part of the arrangement to make him who is to pay the Government revenue, and through whose hands the collection from the ryots must, for that purpose, pass, appear to be the sole owner. Yet, it is admitted, that one so recorded may be really what we should term a trustee for the other member of a joint family, and that the rights of the co-parceners inter se may not be affected by the arrangement (382-3).

Held, therefore, that the expressions in the public documents relating to the settlements of the revenue and other proceedings before the Collectors that the Zemindar or Lumbardar with whom the settlement was made was sole Zemindar or Lumbardar and without partners, and that on the death of the Lumbardar, or person settling for the revenue, his son or next heir, or even an appointee, should be substituted for him, were all consistent with such an arrangement the essence of which was that the person in question should be made ostensibly and on the face of the Revenue records the sole owner of the Zemindary rights, and that no argument could be founded on those expressions that the property in respect of which they were used were the separate property of the Lumbardar, or person settling for the revenue (382-3). The question was whether property recorded in the Settlement Registers in the name of D, one of the members of a joint Hindu family was his separate property or was joint family property. On D's death, his nephew applied to the Revenue authorities to be admitted as heir to his uncle. It was argued that that circumstance showed that the property was the separate property of D and not joint family property.

Held that the inference suggested was not legitimate (383).

On the face of the Revenue records D was the sole registered proprietor. It was, therefore, only as his heir that the applicant could claim to be substituted as sole Zemindar and ostensible owner in his place, A suggestion of joint interest was unnecessary, if, indeed, it would not have been improper, on that occasion. And, it is to be observed that, inasmuch as it appeared before the Collector by the Kanoongoe's reports that D had left a widow, the claim of his nephew as heir implied that the property was not the separate estate of the deceased, and that the succession to it was to be governed by the law which regulates the descent of the property of a joint and undivided Hindoo family (383). A member of a joint Hindu family subject to the Berar Mithakshara law sold his moiety of the family property for the stated sum of Rs. 20,000. On the death of the alienor, the surviving member of the family instituted a suit for the recovery of the property sold to the purchaser and in his possession on the ground that the family was down to the date of the death of the alienor joint in estate and that the surviving member became entitled to the entire family property by survivorship. The lower Court found that the family had continued to be joint as alleged by the plaintiff and that only Rs. 5,000 out of the stated consideration of Rs. 20,000 had been paid to the alienor, and made a decree that the plaintiff be put into possession upon paying Rs. 5,000 to the purchaser.

Their Lordships did not think it necessary to express any opinion on the question whether, even if it was proved that part only of the purchase money was paid, the form of decree adopted by the Court below was appropriate to the case. (Viscount Cave.) SYED KASAM v. JORAWAR SINGH.

Those sales were made by the deceased for his own personal benefit, without the consent of the respondent, and without legal necessity.

The suit out of which the appeal arose was brought by the respondent after the death of Z for cancellation of those three deeds of sale. The sales by Z, being without the consent of his co-parcener, and not justified by legal necessity were admitted to be invalid according to the Mithakshara law governing the family. The only question was whether, the transactions being real and the prices actually paid, the respondent could only recover the shares sold, subject to an equitable charge in favour of the appellant for the Rs. 10,000 which were received by Z.

Held, affirming the Court below that the respondent was entitled to recover the shares sold unconditionally, and that the appellant was not entitled to an equitable charge for the Rs. 10,000 paid by him to Z (198-9).

The respondent took in his own right by survivorship, and is not liable for the personal debts and obligations of his uncle Z; and it appears to their Lordships, that an equity which might have been enforced against Z's interest whilst it existed cannot be made to affect that interest when it has passed to a surviving co-parcener, except by repealing the rule of the Mithakshara law (199). The plaintiff-respondent, and his paternal uncle Z, were members of an undivided family governed by the Bengal Mithakshara law. Z died childless. Shortly before his death he sold his undivided share in the joint family property to the appellant for the sum of Rs. 10,000, which was duly paid by the appellant. The sale by Z, being without the consent of his co-parcener, and not justified by legal necessity, was invalid; and the respondent was held entitled to recover the property sold unconditionally in a suit brought by him for that purpose after the death of Z. The question what would have been the appellant's rights in such a suit if it had been brought during Z's lifetime, however, arose for discussion.

Their Lordships considered it unnecessary to decide whether, if Z had been alive, and so entitled to resume his undivided share on cancellation of the sale-deed, it would have been possible to order partition and to charge Z's divided share with the Rs. 10,000 paid to him by the appellant. They, however, added:—"It might have been quite consistent with equitable principles to refuse to Z restitution of the interest which he sold, except on condi-

The respondent, plaintiff in the suit, and his paternal uncle, Z, were the members of an undivided Hindu family governed by the Mithakshara law in Oudh, which was the same as the Mithakshara law which prevailed in the courts of Bengal, and, as such, were co-sharers of land in certain villages. Z died childless in 1885. Shortly before his death he and his wife executed and delivered three deeds of sale to the appellant of his undivided share and interest in each of those villages. Those sales were made by the deceased for his own personal benefit, without the consent of the respondent, and without legal necessity.

It was conceded in argument for the appellant that the sales by Z, being without the consent of his co-parcener, and not justified by legal necessity, were according to the Bengal Mithakshara law invalid (195-6). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) MADHO PARSHAD v. MEHRBAN SINGH.

———Money drawn by member out of—Acquisitions with—Joint family property or self-acquisition—Agreement entitling each member to make separate acquisitions with money so drawn out.

The joint family property of a Hindu joint family came out of the transactions of a banking firm founded by the common ancestor. An arrangement, embodied in writing, was entered into between the members of the family, the effect of which was to entitle each partner to draw money at his own discretion out of the firm, and to employ that money in his separate trade or separate acquisitions, the firm not being responsible for the losses sustained, and not being entitled to share in the profits arising from those speculations; but, subject to that modification, all the members of the family retained the interest which they previously had as joint members of the firm.

Held, on a construction of the agreement, that the acquisitions made by a member of the family with money drawn out of the firm constituted his self-acquisition and not joint family property (352). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) RAI NURSINGH DOSS v. NARAIN DOSS.

The joint family property of a Hindu joint family came out of the transactions of a banking firm founded by the common ancestor. Held, on the construction of the agreement, affirming the High Court, that a distinction ought to be drawn between pledging the credit of the firm and drawing out money actually belonging to the firm, and that acquisitions made by a member by pledging the credit of the firm belonged to the firm and not separately to the acquirer (353).

The agreement was certainly a very extraordinary one, leaving it as it did in the power of each member to draw to an unlimited amount upon the assets of the firm, an arrangement of which the abuse could only be corrected by a dissolution of the partnership. Their Lordships would not be inclined to extend the operation of such an agreement ———Property which was previously joint family property—Grant of.

JOINT FAMILY PROPERTY OR—GRANT BY GOVERNMENT TO MEMBER—PROPERTY SUBJECT OF.

By the 8th paragraph of the Oudh Proclamation of March, 1858, it was declared, amongst other things, that C. L. Zemindar of Mourawan, and 5 other persons therein mentioned, were thenceforward the sole hereditary proprietors of the lands which they held when Oudh came under British rule. C. L. had died in 1854, long before the Mutiny. Subsequently summary settlements were made with G. S. (the son of C. L.) by the Government between the dates specified in S. 3 of Act I of 1869; and a talookdari sannad was granted to him before the passing of the Act, and subsequently to the 1st of April, 1858, viz., on the 11th of December, 1859, by which the Government bound itself to maintain him and his heirs as sole proprietors of the estate. The name of G. S. was not contained in the 2nd schedule annexed to the Act, but that of C. L. was. C. L. did not enter into a kaboolyat for the lands to which the suit related, but G. S. did.

Held, as regards the estates which were exempted from confiscation, that the sunnud and summary settlements were a mere grant by Government to one member of the family of property which belonged to the family jointly, and that they could not of themselves affect the rights of the family (269-70).

It can scarcely be supposed that the Governor-General intended to injure any member of this loyal family, and by confiscation and re-grant to transfer the beneficial interest in the joint estates of the whole family from the several members of it to a single member of the family for his own sole benefit (269). S, who was a member of a joint Hindu family which carried on a money-lending business, was educated at the expense of the joint family at a Government High School. When he was twenty-two years old, S became a pleader's clerk and continued as a pleader's clerk for some years. Thereafter he was employed in several firms until his death at the age of 52. The knowledge of English which S acquired at the Government school was of use to him as a pleader's clerk and in the other employments in which he was subsequently engaged. From the savings out of his salaries and brokerage, and from the profits which he derived from a money-lending business which he personally carried on, S acquired a fortune of over 2 lakhs of rupees which he purported to dispose of by his will and codicil. The money-lending business which S personally carried on was started by him with capital derived from the savings out of his salary as a pleader's clerk, and without the aid of the joint fund. There was no evidence to show that the education received by S had been of an exceptionally high standard and more expensive than the education which ordinarily would be provided for a member of such a family as he belonged to.

Held, that the property acquired by S was his self-acquired, and not joint family property, and that he had the power of disposing of the same by will.

There is no authority for the contention in this case that the gains made as a clerk, as a broker, or as a money-lender, personally and without the aid of the joint funds, by a member of a joint family who received an ordinary education suitable to his position as a member of the family to which he belonged should in law be regarded as partible and not as his self-acquired property (53). The appellant, who held a salaried appointment in the Indian Civil Service, was a member of a Mithakshara joint family, which carried on in a firm name a joint ancestral business as money-lenders. In a suit brought on hundis given by the firm, in the course of its business, in respect of a firm debt, the question was whether the appellant's earnings, being the gains of science, were his self-acquisitions and were not liable for the suit claim. The appellant took no part in the conduct of the family business. He was not privy to the debts incurred.

In his youth the appellant was for seven years absent from India for the purpose of being specially trained in England for the I. C. S. There was no evidence as to his education and early life. His family being a family of hereditary money-lenders, the ordinary education, which all its male members would naturally and appropriately enjoy was one of considerable extent and included varied attainments. The appellant did not adduce evidence to show that his specialised education in England was obtained by other means than the use of his family property.

Held, that the appellant's official salary was partible property of the joint family, and that the appellant was liable upon the hundis to the extent of his share in the ———Nature of education required to be received.

Very strong and clear authority would be required to support the somewhat startling proposition of law that if a member of a joint Hindu family receives any educution whatever from the joint funds, he becomes for ever after incapable of acquiring by his own skill and industry any separate property. No texts which have been cited go to the full extent of the proposition which has been contended for (117).

It may hereafter possibly become necessary for this Board to consider whether or not the more limited and guarded expression of the law upon this subject of the courts of Bengal is not more correct than what appears to be the doctrine of the courts of Madras (118). ———Partibility of such property—Test—Use of family property in acquiring science by means of which property in question is acquired—Sufficiency of—Use of family property directly for purpose of acquiring property in question—Necessity.

Can it be said that the gains, which are partible, are such as result only directly from the use of joint family funds, and that emoluments, which are the consideration for the personal services of an official selected for his special personal qualifications, result remotely only and too remotely from any family outlay? Not only is no authority forthcomming for the first part of this contention, but the contrary has been continuously assumed in all the cases which turn on "gains of science". The point of all of them is, that persons qualified for earning money by specialised education, enjoyed to the detriment of family funds, become, as it were, a continuing investment for the family benefit. No decision attempts to distinguish between the personal and the family elements in the ultimate gains; it would practically be impossible to do so. There is equally little ground for contending that partibility depends on causa proxima, or is negatived by the intervention of the personal element of the individual co-parcener's character. It is true that in the very learned judgment of Mr. Collett in 2 M. H. C. R. 53, he expresses the view, that logically the rule should have regard to the use of family property in acquiring the partible gains themselves "during and for the purposes of the acquisition", and not to its use in acquiring the science by means of which they are gained. This view was, however, over-ruled on appeal, and has never been re-established. For fifty years and more the current of authority has run the other way, and, in any case, it is now too late to change it. ———Presumption—Onus of proof.

One of the recognised exceptions to the rule that the acquisitions of the members of a joint Hindu family are joint property and partible is property acquired by the possession of special "science" or "learning".

Among the unseparated members of a joint Hindu family, possessed of ancestral property by means of which the science, whose gains are in question might itself have been acquired, the presumption, even in the case of such special gains, is that the acquisitions of all members are partible, until the contrary is proved. It is true that a distinction may be drawn between a presumption in favour of partibility, which is a legal attribute of the gains in question, and a presumption in favour of detriment to the patrimony involved in acquiring the specialised training, the use of which has produced the gain, which is a question of fact; but if it is in general incumbent upon the joint family member to prove that his case is an exception to the prevailing rule of partibility, it is also incumbent upon him to prove the particular facts, which are needed to establish the exception. ———"Science" in text of Mithakshara—Meaning of—Technical meaning—Learning.

The word in S. 4, Chapter I of the Mithakshara, which Mr. Colebroke has translated as "science" means learning; and that is apparently the meaning which has been generally accepted by the Courts in India. It gives the Sanskrit word a wider meaning than it would otherwise have. It would be difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain what would have been the science or sciences which the author of the Mithakshara, who wrote his commentary in the latter part of the 11th century, had in contemplation if he used a word which meant "science" strictly so called and is not susceptible of the wider and more comprehensive meaning "learning".

Education beyond that of a very elementary kind must have been limited to very few of the people for whose guidance the Mithakshara was written, and for that limited few there could have been then no education attainable in the arts, sceinces, and professions of that time comparable with the education now obtainable and necessary for a successful career in the arts, sciences, and professions of the present day. It may be assumed that the author of the Mithakshara, who was construing and explaining the more ancient texts of the Hindu law for the benefit and guidance of the Hindu community, could not have intended to penalise an education which was not in his contemplation and of which necessarily he knew nothing. Nor can it be assumed that his intention was to penalise and discourage self-acquired skill, or the exercise of high mental abilities or great individual effort in winning success in an art or science, or in a profession. He must have been writing of ———Criterion as to—Purchase-money—Source of.

In cases in which the question is whether property purchased in the name of a member of a joint Hindu family is his self-acquisition or part of the joint family property, the criterion is to consider from what source the money came with which the purchase-money was paid.

Where there was no evidence that the member in whose name the purchase was made had any separate property, or that it was from his funds that any part of the purchase-money was paid, held, that the property purchased must be considered to be joint property (240). ———On the trial of the issue whether property purchased by a member of a joint Hindu family is joint family property or the separate property of the member purchasing, the principal fact to be ascertained is the source from which the purchase-money of the property in question was derived, i.e., whether it came from the joint family chest or from the separate funds of the member purchasing (843). ———Evidence — Family accounts—Private accounts of member—Value of—Issue between other members and purchaser of property in execution of decree for separate debt of that member,

Appellants were the purchasers at a sale held in execution of a decree obtained against a member of a joint Hindu family for his separate debt of his right, title, and interest in certain property standing in the name of that member. Their case was that the said property was the separate property of their judgment-debtor in which the other members of the family had no interest whatever. The case of the other members of the family was that the property had been purchased by the member, who was the judgment-debtor, with joint family funds, and was therefore joint-family property.

Held, that in such a case the family accounts taken by themselves would be admissible only as corroborative evidence, but that the private accouuts of the judgment-debtor might be direct evidence, in the nature of admissions on his part, against the appellants (844). The appeal arose out of a suit brought by the plaintiff-respondent for the recovery of one-half of all the property in possession of one R, the plaintiff's uncle, at the time of his death. The suit was brought against the widows of R, and against his grandson, the son of his daughter. The plaintiff's case was that R, at the time of his death, was a member of a joint family, consisting of himself and of the plaintiff and his brother K, who did not join in the suit. The question for decision was whether the plaintiff was joint with R at his death.

The plaintiff admitted in his plaint that his grandfather divided the ancestral property amongst his four sons, including R and the father of the plaintiff. He alleged, however, that the four sons did not take separately, but that R and his (plaintiff's) father took one-half and remained a joint family. while the other half was taken by the other two sons jointly, who accordingly formed a separate family. There was no distinct proof, one way or the other, as to the nature of the division by the grandfather. It further appeared that. in the lifetime of R, the plaintiff and his brother K, as between themselves, separated, and therefore the family was still further broken up. It also appeared that, whatever the division of the property might have been by the grandfather, all the members of the family lived separately, and there was no commensality between them.

Held that it lay upon the plaintiff to establish by evidence the foundation of his case, viz., that the property of R was joint property to which he and his brother K, as surviving members, were entitled.

Held further, reversing the Courts below, that the plaintiff had failed to discharge the onus which lay upon him.

In the case of an ordinary Hindu family who are living together, or who have their entire property in common, the presumption is, that all that any one member of the family is found in possession of, belongs to the common stock. That is the ordinary presumption, and the onus of establishing the contrary is thrown on the member of the family who disputes it. Having regard, however, to the state of this family when the present dispute arose, their Lordships think that that presumption cannot be relied upon as the foundation of the plaintiff's case, and therefore, as he seeks to recover property which was in the possession of R and was ostensibly his own at the time of his death, it lies upon him to establish by evidence the foundation of his case, viz., that the property was joint property to which he and his brother K, as surviving members, were entitled. It was contended before their Lordships that in arriving at the above finding the courts below misconstrued a letter written by S to his elder brother and which was as follows :—" I am ready to join my property with the family property, and take my share from it."

Held, agreeing with the courts below, that the letter was a conditional offer made by S to throw his self-acquisition into the common stock if the brother would come to a partition, and that, as the offer was never accepted, the letter had no effect on the rights of the parties (45-6). ———Evidence of.

The question was whether certain property, which was assumed to have been originally acquired property of one Paupa Reddy, had been thrown by him, although his separate acquisition, into a common stock.

Upon that question the court below considered that two documents were themselves sufficient evidence of the fact. The one was a document which was called Ex. I and it was as follows :—"The humble petition of Paupa Reddy. The muttas registered in my name" (the properties in dispute) "and those registered in the name of myself and my elder brother's son, Polam Reddy, and also those property enjoyed by us, as also the choultry and the charities, belong after my death to the said Polam Reddy, and to none else." The court below was of opinion that that writing was a writing evidencing a very deliberate recognition and admission by Paupa Reddy of the then existing condition of the property that it was part of a joint property of himself and Polam Reddy.

The other document was an income-tax return; in which Paupa Reddy lumped the properties in dispute together with the other lands which were undoubtedly the joint property of himself and Polam Reddy, and treated them all alike as joint property.

Held, that it was utterly impossible for their Lordships to come to the conclusion that the Court below was wrong in treating those documents as very important evidence, and in drawing the conclusion that the proper inference from them was, that it was a recognition of the fact that the separate property had become joint property. ———Evidence of—Evidence held sufficient except with regard to purchases in name of son-in-law.

While it is possible that a member of a joint Hindu family should make separate acquisitions, and keep moneys and property so acquired as his separate property, yet the question whether he has done so is to be judged from all the circumstances of the case.

A, a member of a joint Hindu family whose house was at Lucknow, practised as a pleader at Hardoi, and made considerable savings from his professional earnings. He eventually became managing member but was all along entrusted with the management of the joint family property in Hardoi district. Throughout he kept the accounts of the joint property and of his own earnings in one account book. He purchased sundry properties out of the funds so entered in the name of his son-in-law, B, and stated that he made such purchases to provide for B.

Held that, by blending his private earnings with the receipts and payments on joint account, A showed an intention to make them joint property, but that this fact was not conclusive as to the question whether all purchases entered in the book were made for the joint family, and that as regards the purchases in the name of B the evidence showed that the properties were intended to be given away to B and he was therefore entitled to the same. ———Evidence of — Inheritance from collateral—Property got by—Throwing into common stock of.

The question was whether D, a member of a Hindu family, threw into the common stock property which he got by inheritance from a collateral and which was therefore his self-acquisition. It further appeared that, at "a deorh partition" between D and K, D gave ancestral family property, and received K's share in property coming from the collateral, and that D gave property got by him from the collateral and received K's share of ancestral family property.

———Evidence—Trading acquisitions made without aid of ancestral property—Throwing into common stock of—Evidence of—Rights created by.

In a suit for partition, the question was whether, as alleged by plaintiff, the suit property, and in particular, the property of five banking firms, was the joint and undivided property of the family of plaintiff and his brothers or their children, and consequently, whether by the Hindu law governing the parties, the issueless widow of D, one of the brothers, was incapable of taking a share of it. The defendant's case was that the suit property was in no degree acquired by the use of ancestral property, that D left his native village to seek his fortunes some years after his father's death with nothing but his drinking vessel; that he took service with a native banker at Agra; that, whilst in that service, he realized a small capital by means of some private adventure; that with the capital so acquired and its accretions he established the suit Banking firms; that he associated his brothers with himself from motives of family affection; employing them in the business rather as dependants than as partners on an equal footing with himself; and that the property of the different firms was partnership property to be dealt with according to the rules which regulate mercantile partnerships between strangers and was not subject to the rule of Hindu law which excludes a widow from the succession to her husband's share of the joint property of an undivided family (502 3).

The evidence fell far short of proof that the ancestral property contributed in any material degree to the acquisition of the funds employed in trade which formed the bulk of the property in dispute. It appeared that the family was, however, an undivided family, and that there was a nucleus of ancestral property and that D laid the foundation of the future fortune of the family. But there was no proof that he kept as separate, or treated as separate, property that which he acquired at Agra. On the other hand, it was shown that many years before his death he associated his brothers with himself as partners, and that thenceforward they carried on business together each contributing by his exertions to the increase of the common stock (505).

Held, there was nothing prima facie improbable in the hypothesis that D brought his earlier gains voluntarily into the common stock, making them the capital on which he and his brothers were to trade. All subsequent gains being made by their joint exertions would, according to the general principle of Hindu Law, be the joint property of the family whilst undivided, and be partible as such on a partition. The onus lay on the defendants of proving a special contract which impressed the character of partnership as distinguished from joint or separate property in the Hindu sense of those terms, upon the property in question (506). A will by a member of a joint Hindu family bequeathing his co-sharer's interest which does not operate as a will at all may be good evidence of a family arrangement contemporaneously made and acted upon by all the parties (132).

A and B, two brothers, were members of a joint Hindu family governed by the Mithakshara law. A fell seriously ill and was not expected to recover. He was desirous that after his death the name of his widow should be entered in respect of his share in the joint property, and that after the death of the said widow his share in the property should devolve upon his daughter and daughter's son, and that a document to effect that object should be executed. Accordingly A and B jointly executed a document called a will, which provided that on the death of A his wife should have and enjoy for her life an interest in a moiety of the joint property equivalent to the interest which the widow of a sonless and separated Hindu would have in her deceased husband's estate. After the death of A, the name of his wife was entered by B in the revenue papers in respect of a moiety of the property. It also appeared that the risk of a partition at any moment was in the contemplation of A and B when they executed the document in question.

Held that the document, though invalid as a will, was good evidence of a mutual agreement by A and B that the interest which A's widow obtained by the agreement should continue for the benefit of her life, notwithstanding the birth, if it should happen, of "male issue" to B (132-3). The High Court of Madras has ruled that a co-parcener cannot dispose of his undivided share by will. Its reasons for making this distinction between a gift and a devise are, that the co-parcener's power of alienation is founded on his right to a partition ; that that right dies with him ; and that, the title of his co-sharers by survivorship vesting in them at the moment of his death, there remains nothing upon which the will can operate. This principle was fully recognised by their Lordships in Suraj Bunsi Koer's case. Their Lordships are of opinion that the principles upon which the Madras Court has decided against the power of alienation by will are sound, and sufficient to support that decision (194-5). ———Debt joint due by family—Apportionment of—Agreement at partition for—Member paying more than his share of debt—Contribution against other members—Right of—Construction of agreement.

The appeal arose out of a suit commenced by the respondents to compel contribution towards the payment of certain debts which had been discharged by M, their father. The action was founded upon an agreement alleged to have been made by the appellants to pay their equal proportions of a joint debt effected on a common family property. That common family property was divided in 1799, and several agreements were then entered into. The question in the case turned upon the meaning of those agreements. If it was the meaning of them that the Bankers' claims were to be paid by all the five persons in equal proportions, according to the interest they respectively had in the family estate, and that that was to be done by the settlement of the accounts between the parties, the respondents were clearly right in bringing the action against the appellants for four-fifths of those Bankers' account, and that question depended upon the construction of those agreements which were entered into between the parties after the reference that took place in 1799.

It appeared that there had been disputes between the family with respect to the property acquired by the father, and that all those parties agreed to refer the matter to certain arbitrators, and while that arbitration was still pending, they entered into two agreements. One of those agreements was dated 11—6—1799, that is, the first of those agreements entered into between the parties, and in that agreement the five sons alleged that they had made a division of the landed properties, and they agreed to pay the bankers in five equal shares, that is, that each should pay one-fifth of those demands. They further stated that in case any one of them should be under an inability to do so, and his lands should be sold in consequence, that from their own shares they would make that good, "and that they will certainly and without fail liquidate the Bankers' demands."

Then there came a separate agreement, in which, after alluding to the demands of the Bankers upon which suits were then pending, they went on to provide, that in case there should be other demands they would leave them to the decision of the arbitrators, and they agreed to abide by their decision with respect to their quota.

And then came the third agreement, and they having again provided that though they had divided the estates among themselves, the personal property, including cash, still remained in common, agreed that all the debts which were due to the estate should be equally divided among them, and they stipulated that the payment of the Bankers' demands should be carried into immediate effect, and should not be delayed by any division of the family property, or by the settlement of the debts which might be due to the family to be divided between them.

Held, on a construction of the agreements, that the Bankers' claims were to be paid by all the five persons in equal proportions, according to the interest they respectively had in the family estate, and that the respondents therefore had clearly a right to recover from the appellants four-fifths of all those Bankers' demands. ———Joint living and joint enjoyment of property—Agreement for—Provision in, for management by eldest brother—Effect- Relation of eldest brother to others—Accountability of eldest brother to them.

A panchayat was appointed to make partition between three brothers, who formed a joint Hindu family, and their nephew, who had succeeded to the Merangi estate. That body made an award, and a revised award which effected a final settlement as between the three brothers on one side and their nephew on the other. But the day before the revised award was completed, the three brothers entered into an agreement which ran as follows :—

"As one of us has not agreed to the award passed by the panchayat in the dispute in respect of dayam (partition) which took place between us three and our nephew, we have resolved to live jointly, and have arranged, among ourselves, the following conditions for living jointly :—

1. That the three shares belonging to us jointly under the panchayat award should be kept joint ;

2. that R, who is the eldest of us, should take charge of the said three shares and manage the same ; and

3. that we should live jointly for twelve years from this date, and effect division thereafter after settling the profit or loss accruing up to that date. Should in the meantime any of us desire to become divided, without remaining joint for twelve years as aforesaid, the member so desiring should give up his share in the profits which may accrue up to that date and should himself bear the loss which may have been occasioned thereby."

This arrangement was followed during the twelve years' term. About two years afterwards the youngest brother (for whom the respondents, his two minor sons, were substituted) filed a suit against his two brothers, the appellants, for a division and delivery of his third share of the property, including the income during the twelve years' term. R, the eldest brother, contended that under the agreement the three brothers remained a joint Hindu family, and that he was the manager of that family, and was not accountable for the income of past years.

Held, over-ruling the defendant's view of the agreement, that R was an agent for the three, unpaid it is true, but accountable for his receipts and expenditure. The description of him as a trustee, and as liable for failure in frugality or skill, is open to criticism in point of expression.

The agreement is not a simple agreement to postpone the partition, and so to leave the family status of the brothers untouched. They are put upon a new footing. The defendant has the management secured to him for an absolute term of twelve years, and though during that term the others would not be precluded from demanding division, they could only do so on condition of giving up profits and bearing any loss occasioned by their premature withdrawal. Moreover, the division when it comes is to be effected after settling the profit and loss accruing to that date. That is hardly the language which would have been used if the parties had meant nothing except that they should divide the corpus of the estate as it stood at the end of the term, whether it had increased or decreased. The language is more appropriate to express an intention that an account should be taken of receipts and expenses, treating surpluses as profits and deficits as loss. That a member of a Mithakshara joint family can, with the consent of his co-sharers, charge for his own purposes the share in the joint family property which would come to him on a partition cannot now be questioned as a principle of Hindu law. ———Effect of.

The effect of members of a joint family, who have control over the joint estate, blending that estate with property in which they have separate interests is to cause the whole property to become joint. The effect is the same in cases where separate estate is brought into a joint family account and in cases where joint family property is brought into the separate accounts. ———Evidence of.

Where the real question for determination was what was the true conclusion to be drawn when people united by bonds of close relationship and living as a joint family, drew for the joint family expenses out of a fund enriched by other contributions, and the sub-judge stated the result in the following words:—"If the members of a joint Hindu family confuse the incomes of their joint properties with their separate properties, their intention presumably is that the properties acquired with such mixed up funds are for the benefit of the joint family. It should be noticed that not only these acquisitions and improvements made in this case with the amalgamated and confused funds, but the incomes arising from such acquisitions and improvements were again partly spent also for joint family expenses and purposes, and the balances were again mixed up and confused from year to year to acquire properties and make improvements" held, dissenting from the High Court, that the sub-judge was right in drawing the inference of blending from such facts and that the fact that the joint family expenses exceeded all the property which was properly joint told against the case of no blending instead of in favour of it. MOCURRAREE LEASE IN FAVOUR OF SOME—PUTNI LEASE SUBSEQUENT TO DIFFERENT MEMBERS—MERGER.

———Intention of parties—Evidence.

A mokurruri lease of lands within a mouza was granted to two persons, who were members of a joint Hindu family. Ten years later, the owner of the mouza granted a patni lease of the whole mouza to K, the son of one of the lessees under the mokurruree lease and another, not a member of the joint family. Subsequently, this last-named person sold his share of the putni to K. The circumstances of the case showed with great clearness that instead of the mokurruri lease having been extinguished by merger, it was, on the contrary, kept up.

Held, that there was no merger, because, in addition to the fact that the two sets of title did not meet in identity of name, but were separately attached to separate members of the family, the documents and the accounts showed that the mokurruri lease and the rights consequent upon it were kept alive. A deed of partition between two brothers provided that the villages of the shares of both of them should thereafter descend only to the sons and grandsons and so on of both of them, and should not go to any others. Pursuant to the deed the two brothers divided their family estate, each taking a share of villages which each held separately. On the death of one of them leaving a widow and daughters, the widow obtained possession of the villages which formed her husband's share; and a suit brought against her by the other brother to recover those villages was dismissed on the ground that the divided shares descended according to law. The widow thereupon transferred the villages to her elder daughter. The suit out of which the appeal arose was an ejectment brought by the appellant to recover possession of the suit property. The appellant was the grandson of a sister of A, who had predeceased A. At a partition made between the three brothers of A, on the death of A, the appellant was awarded a share of the property of A, which share was the suit property. The defendants pleaded that the transaction embodied in the said partition deed was on the part of one of the brothers of A, viz., P, a benami transaction, that the grant of a share to the appellant at the said partition was made to him as benamidar for the said brother of A, and that the appellant never had possession of the property in dispute and that his claim was barred by limitation and adverse possession.

Held, reversing the High Court and affirming the court below, that the burden of proving that the grant of a share to the appellant at the partition was made to him as benamidar rested upon the defendants, that they had absolutely failed to discharge that burden, and that the appellant's claim was not barred by limitation or adverse possession. It was contended for the defendants that the effect of the separation and partition between J and his brother in 1903 was to cause, by implication of law, a separation between J and his descendants and to make them cease to constitute amongst themselves a joint family, unless it was proved that they had agreed to continue to be a joint Hindu family.

In a suit brought by plaintiff, after the death of his father, against his brothers for a partition of the joint family properties, held, that there was nothing in the prior decision which amounted to an adjudication between the brothers as to their rights in the joint ancestral estate on their father's death and that the suit was not therefore barred by S. 2 of C.P.C. of 1859 (190). The dispute was between two brothers, the sons of one J, as to the right of the younger brother, the respondent, to a half share of three villages called Bairampur, Ichna, and Dubawan.

The case depended upon the effect of a family arrangement which was stated in a petition presented to the Court on 8th November, 1882, and in the proceedings thereon on the 9th November.

J was one of five brothers. One of them, A, was represented in the suit by L; another was B; the third was represented by S, who was adopted by him, but who was a son of J; the fourth was C.

The questions which were the subject of the compromise had arisen in the lifetime of J, who died a few months before the compromise was actually entered into, so that what the parties were agreeing about by the compromise was, not the right of Manick Chand (the appellant) as the eldest son of J as against the other members of the family, but the right of J and the claim he had upon the other members of the family on account of his services in managing the property, and in acquiring other property and so increasing the value of the family estate.

The petition stated that a dispute having arisen between B, C, and L, on the one side, and the appellant, the respondent, and S, on the other side, and a case about the matter being before the Court, the above-named parties had settled the matter amongst themselves, upon the terms that "out of the whole lot of Zemindari and mortgaged villages, in parganas Chandra and Aurangabad, two entire villages, viz., Village Ichna....and Village Dubawan....shall be given with proprietary right to Manick Chand" (appellant), "the eldest son of J, to the exclusion of others and over and above his shares. As, to the rest of the villages in parganas Chandra and Aurangabad it has been determined that jethansi dues shall be levied in them at the rate of 5 bighas per Rs. 100, or at the cash rate of 5 per cent. on the revenue, the village of Bairampur....becoming included in Bai Kuian pargana Aurangabad. The revenues and profits of this village shall be at the disposal of Manick Chand, no other party shall have anything to do with it. Should the area of Bairampur be found wanting in payment of jethansi dues at the rate of 5 bighas per Rs. 100, the deficiency shall be made good from other villages in the manner to be proposed....mentioned above."

The question was what was meant by the statement that the villages, Ichna and Dubawan, were given "with proprietary right to Manick Chand, to the exclusion of others, and over and above his shares."

Held, on a construction of the arrangement come to by the compromise petition in question and of other petitions, that it was not intended thereby to deal with the rights of Manick Chand and Hira Lal (the respondent) as between each other, but with the rights of Manick Chand and Hira Lal as representing their father J, and the rights of the other brothers, and that the Court below was therefore right in holding that the respondent was entitled to a share in the two villages, Ichna and Dubawan. Held, that the yadast did not require registration, because it was not a document by itself creating, assigning, limiting, or extinguishing any right or interest in immoveable property within the meaning of S. 17 (b) of the Registration Act, but was a document merely creating a right to obtain another document which would, when executed, create a right in the person claiming the relief, and therefore fell under the proviso to sub-S. 2 of S. 17 of the Act. ———Division of proceeds of joint property in definite shares—Agreement for, with intention that each member should hold his allotted share in severalty.

The cases which have been recently decided by this tribunal on questions touching the separation of the joint property of a Hindu family establish the principle that there may be a division of right and interest, which will operate to change the character of the ownership from joint to separate, although it may not be intended at once to perfect it by an actual partition by metes and bounds ; and, therefore, that the agreement of a family to divide the proceeds of the joint property among its members in definite shares, with the intention that each should hold his allotted share in severalty, severs the joint interest, and extinguishes the rights springing from united family ownership. The question of intention must arise in all such cases and be determined in each upon its own circumstances (153). (*Sir Montague E. ———Effect of.

Although an agreement for a partition has not been carried out by actual partition, by metes and bounds, of the property, it is nevertheless binding on the contracting parties, and operates as a division of the family (138).

A Samakha or agreement was entered into by two brothers, who constituted a joint Hindu family, for a division of the joint ancestral estate. No actual division took place, or separate seizin by the co-sharers of the estate, but the agreement was partly acted upon, by separate perception of the rents, and the parties also lived separately.

By virtue of this agreement no person shall be competent to bring any claim in any court in respect of any portion of the property other than the property detailed below."

Then, after some immaterial provisions, there followed a specification of the villages belonging to the family and the shares in which those villages were thereafter to be held. The agreement was registered on the same day. From that time the property had been entered in the register in accordance with the arrangement contained in the agreement. And on the death of B, in 1895 his share was entered in the name of his widow, the respondent.

N, and his nephews formed at one time a joint Hindu family subject to the law of the Mithakshara. Before 29-9-1902, they had become separate in mess and residence, but not in estate.

On 29-9-1902, N executed a registered sale-deed to the appellant conveying his half share of the ancestral property of the family. No partition was then effected, but the purchaser was allowed to hold and cultivate certain parts of the property corresponding in value to a half share. On 4-12-1905 all the members of the family signed a kararnama appointing G, as arbitrator to partition the property and agreeing to accept whatever partition he might make.

The arbitrator divided the property into two lists, one (representing a moiety in value) containing the property to be allotted to N, and the other (representing the remaining moiety in value) containing the property to be allotted to the plaintiffs. The formal division was not at once carried out, as N died on 26-3-1906; but after his death the lists were acted upon by all the persons interested, as the purchaser was put into possession of the property allotted by the arbitrator to N, and the plaintiffs from time to time dealt with various parts of the lands contained in their lists.

In a suit brought in 1914 by the plaintiffs against S, claiming possession of the lands of which he had been so put into possession on the ground that the family had continued joint in estate down to the death of N, and that on the death of N's widow (which occurred in 1910) the property had passed to them, held, reversing the Court below, that the transactions which took place in 1905 effected a severance of the joint estate, and accordingly the plaintiffs had no right to sue.

In the present case it was proved that N claimed his half share of the ancestral property, and that after discussion all the joint holders signed the agreement of 4-12-1905, appointing G to partition the property and agreeing to accept whatever partition he might make; and this claim and agreement were quite sufficient to effect a severance in interest and to prevent the share of N from passing by survivorship. COMPROMISE EFFECTING.

———Disputes having arisen respecting the validity of the marriage of A, a Hindu, the two sons of A, each claiming to be legitimate, the one against the other as illegitimate, to avoid litigation, they entered, with the surviving widow of A, into a family arrangement and compromise to the effect, that the sons were to be equally entitled in moieties of A's estate, provision being made for maintenance to the widow, but the division was not to take effect until the youngest son was of age. No actual partition took place, and the youngest son pre-deceased his brother, who died in possession. Both sons left widows, but no male issue.

Held that the effect of the agreement and compromise was to constitute the two brothers a divided family, and the succession to their divided estate was governed by the law of succession in respect to separate estate, and that the widows were entitled, on the death of their husbands, each to a moiety of the estate (517).

Their Lordships are on the whole of opinion that although the documents postpone indefinitely the actual division of the Talook by metes and bounds, and provide for its joint management, and, in certain events which have not happened, for its devolution otherwise than by the law which regulates the succession to separate property, they nevertheless contemplate its enjoyment in other respects by the two brothers as by members of a divided family and the actual division of other family property. Their Lordships accordingly think that the finding of the High Court that the brothers were not members of a joint and undivided Hindoo family must be taken to be correct (517). (Lord Cairns). DECREE EFFECTING.

———S brought an action against his cousin, the appellant, in which he alleged that the appellant had expelled him from the joint family and that he sued to recover possession of his eight annas share of all the joint properties, both real and personal, with mesne profits and interest from the date of dispossession. In that suit a decree was passed which was in effect to give S a separate share of the joint family property. It gave him in terms possession of the 8 annas which he claimed of the real estate; it gave him mesne profits from the day of the alleged separation,—that is, from the time when he left the house in which he had been living with his cousin,—and it gave him also a half of the personal property.

Held that, although the suit was not actually in terms for a partition, yet that the decree did effect a partition, at all events, of rights which was effectual to destroy the joint estate under the doctrine laid down in Appovier's case (232). ———The suit was by the younger of two brothers against the elder and persons claiming portions of the suit property under alienations made by the elder brother or the father of the brothers for a partition of the suit property and for the recovery of the plaintiff's share freed from the interests claimed by the alienees except to the extent to which the alienations in their favour were binding on the plaintiff. On a plea raised by the elder brother that the suit property was impartible, an issue covering the plea was raised and tried separately. The trial Judge decided that issue in favour of the plaintiff, by his judgment dated 24—8—1871. The Judge then appointed a Commissioner and referred to him certain points, all of which had reference to the different mortgages or alienations relied upon by the alienees and to the question of how far the mortgages had been discharged by the usufruct of the mortgaged property. No appeal was preferred against the judgment of 24—8—1871, or the finding of the first Court on the question of partibility of the suit estate.

The plaintiff died after the date of the judgment of 24—8—1871, but before the suit was disposed of on the other points as well, and the question arose whether his representatives could continue the suit and recover his moiety.

Held that the judgment of 24—8—1871 was equivalent to a declaratory decree determining that there was to be a partition of the estate into metes and bounds, and making the brothers separate in estate from that date, if they had not previously become so; and that accordingly though the actual division of the property was not complete, the case fell within the principle of Appovier v. Rama Subba Aiyan (11 M.I.A. 75), and there was no ground for the contention that upon the death of the plaintiff his interest passed to his elder brother, and not to his own representatives in the course of succession to separate estate as ascertained in the suit (181).

By the judgment of 24—8—1871 there was a clear adjudication that the property was partible, and that the rights of the two brothers were that each should have a moiety, and the only object of the subsequent proceedings in the suit was to ascertain how far the share of the second brother, which had thus been declared to be a moiety of each village, was affected by the incumbrances and alienations of his father and his elder brother (180). DEED EFFECTING.

———A deed of partition made and executed by the members of an undivided family, after dealing with the villages that were intended at once to be the subject of an actual partition, proceeded thus :—"But inasmuch as it is not convenient to divide now our moiety of the villages" (then followed an enumeration of the villages), "we shall divide every year in six shares the produce of them, and enjoy it, after deducting the Cirkar Cist and charges on the villages." The words with which the deed closed were: "We have henceforward no interest in each other's effects and debts except friendship between us."

Held that the deed operated in law as a conversion of the character of the property and an alteration of the title of the family, converting it from a joint to separate ownership, and that it was sufficient to make a divided family, nnd to make a divided possession of what was previously undivided, without the necessity of its being carried out into an actual partition of the subject-matter (92-3). We have executed this deed to have matters entirely above board, and to have names enrolled in the Government record in respect of the estates. It is desirable and very necessary for the declarants. according to this deed, to have the names of all the parties enrolled for equal shares. Now also by amicable settlement the business of the kotee will continue to be carried on jointly and in partnership in the same manner as carried on heretofore. We will amicably transact all matters connected with the kotee in consultation and agreement among ourselves, and will keep appropriating and enjoying the profits thereof in proportion to the aforesaid shares, viz., equal one-fourth share each." The ikrarnamah then provided for any estates which might be purchased out of the moneys of the kotee. It also provided that certain silver articles, tents, carpets for assemblies, and conveyances, should continue as before, in possession of all four sharers.

There was not much, if any, evidence as to what was done in order to procure a mutation of names, or to carry out stipulation of the deed "to have the names of all the parties enrolled for equal shares." It appeared, however, that in the butwara proceedings, the respondent, the childless widow of M, was named as the heir of her late husband, and represented his interest in the proceedings taken for a formal partition by metes and bounds of certain properties between the whole of the family on the one side and certain co-sharers in those properties on the other, An inspection of the accounts of the kotee kept after the date of the deed showed that they were kept as they would be kept between four ordinary partners, and not as they would be kept as between members of a joint and undivided Hindu family.

In a suit brought by the respondent for the recovery of her husband's share of the family property as his heiress, held, that the real intentlon of the parties to the ikrarnamah was to hold and enjoy the property, which was the subject of it, in severalty, and that the respondent was entitled to her husband's share as his heiress (71).

Their Lordships, after carefully considering the whole deed and the evidence in the cause, have come to the conclusion that this case is undistinguishable from that in 11 M. I. A. 75 (71). (Sir James Colvile.) BABOO DOORGA PERSHAD v. MUSSUMAT KUNDUN KOOWAR.

That deed, after reciting that N and his deceased cousin had formed a joint Hindu family and that by the adoption his son had become sole heir to half of the entire joint family property and the other half belonged to him (N), provided that his (N's) half share in the famliy property might be kept as joint if both the widows would approve, but that if they did not appreve of it they might separate it and give it at any time they liked. The deed then provided for the management of the half of the property belonging to the adopted son, for the maintenance of the widows, and such other matters,

Held, on a construction of the said deed of adoption, that by it N declared that he had separated from the adopted son.

It was not merely an expression of an intention to separate. Their Lordships find as a fact and hold in law that on the date of that deed, N had separated from the boy whom he had given in adoption and had ceased to be a member with the adopted son of the joint family, although no partition of the family property had been effected (521). ———Liberty to member to live as joint family as before or to separate his own business—Reservation of—Effect.

By an ikrarnamah executed by the members of a joint Hindu family it was declared that an arrangement in respect of all the properties and estates, moveable and immoveable, as per list annexed, and those not included therein, had been come to in the manner stated therein. The ikrarnama then continued as follows :—

"Now all the parties are at liberty to have the respective names registered in the Collectorate jointly or separately and to hold possession of the properties according to their respective proportionate shares. Each party shall have in future no claim of any kind whatsoever, on the ground of the share being more or less, or in respect of the debts due to mahajans, or in respect of the debts due to themselves against the other party, and each party shall pay off his proportionate share of the debts due to the mahajan in any way he thinks proper. Whatever sums are due to us from other persons under bahi khatas, mortgage or simple bond, Zurpeshgi and sudbharna (deeds), as per private list separately drawn up and signed by us, the declarants, shall also be realized by us collectively, either privately or through the Court, and divided among us in proportion to our respective shares, or the sums due to us respectively shall be collected separately. Every one of us has, by virtue of this deed, the power either to continue to live together as a member of the joint family as before, or to separate his own business, none of us having any objection thereto."

Held, reversing the High Court, that the ikrarnama effected a separation in estate and interest between all the coparceners who were parties to it (148-9,)

There is no difficulty in the construction of the ikrarnama in which it is stated in unambiguous terms that defined shares in the whole estate had been alloted to the several co-parceners. Reliance was placed on the passage which gave liberty to any of the parties either to live together as a member of the joint family as before or to separate his own business as being inconsistent with a separation in estate. But there is no inconsistency, and the clause conferred on the parties no larger liberty of choice than they would have had without it. They might elect either to have a partition of their shares by metes and bounds, or to continue to live together and enjoy their property in common as before. Whether they did one or the other would affect the mode of enjoyment, but not the tenure of the property or their interest in it. Consistently with the broad principle laid down in the Appovier Case, this was determined by the allotment to them of defined shares which, to use Lord Westbury's illustration, converted them from joint holders into tenants-in-common (149). ———Separation from the joint family involving the severance of the joint status so far as the separating member is concerned, with all the legal consequences resulting therefrom is quite distinct from the de facto division into specific shares of the property held until then jointly. One is a matter of individual decision, the desire on the part of any one member to sever himself from the joint family and to enjoy his hitherto undefined or unspecified share separately from the others without being subject to the obligations which arise from the joint status ; whilst the other is the natural resultant from his decision, the division and separation of his share, which may be arrived at either by private agreement among the parties, or, on failure of that by the intervention of the Court. Once the decision has been unequivocally expressed and clearly intimated to his co-sharers, his right to obtain and possess the share to which he admittedly has a title is unimpeachable ; neither the co-sharers can question it, nor can the Court examine his conscience to find out whether his reasons for separation were well-founded or sufficient ; the Court has simply to give effect to his right to have his share allocated separately from the others (160-1). The severance of status is a matter of individual volition ; while the allotment of shares may be effected by different methods, by private agreement, by arbitrators appointed by the parties, or, in the last resort, by the Court (161). EFFECT OF, ON STATUS OF FAMILY.

———It has been contended that if there be a deed of division between the members of an undivided family, which speaks of a division having been agreed upon, to be thereafter made, of the property of that family, that deed is ineffectual to convert the undivided property into divided property until it has been completed by an actual partition by metes and bounds. Their Lordships do not find that any such doctrine has been established ; and the argument appears to them to proceed upon error in confounding the division of title with the division of the subject to which the title is applied (89). ———The cases which have been recently decided by this tribunal on questions touching the separation of the joint property of a Hindu family establish the principle that there may be a division of right and interest, which will operate to change the character of the ownership from joint to separate, although it may not be intended at once to perfect it by an actual partition by metes and bounds (153). In a joint Hindu family a disruption of the status of jointness may take place by agreement, without division of the estate by metes and bounds. Even an unambiguous expression of an intention by one member of the joint family to separate and hold his share separately will suffice. But the question is one of fact, and the onus is on the party alleging separation of interest or the intention to separate to affirmatively establish it.

In a case in which there had been no actual partition between two brothers, it was not even alleged that they enjoyed separately the rents and profits of their respective shares, and there was no suggestion that they were separate in mess and worship, and what was contended for was that by their acts they had agreed to a "division of interest" which amounted in law to a separation, a number of documents being relied upon for that purpose. Held that the plaintiff, who rested his claim on the alleged separation, utterly failed to establish it. The question was whether the 1st appellant had separated completely and effectually from his family in or about the year 1870, with the result that the property subsequently acquired by him by his own exertions was his own, or whether, as contended for the respondents, the said property was property of the joint family, on the ground that the 1st appellant had never completely and effectually separated from his family, and that the wealth which he subsequently acquired was merely an accretion of the portion of the family property, whether his full share of it, or not, of which he obtained the possession and enjoyment at the time of the alleged separation. It was admitted that no regular deed of partition had been executed at the time of the alleged partition.

Held on the facts, reversing the Court below and affirming the trial Judge, that the 1st appellant had, as alleged by the appellants, separated in interest and title and that the property in suit was his self-acquisition. son and heir of one R, who died in December, 1850. The defendants were grandsons of D, the elder brother of R. The plaintiff alleged that the properties sought to be recovered by him constituted the separate estate of R. The defendants, on the other hand, maintained that the family was joint, and the property undivided, and that, consequently on R's death, it devolved on them by survivorship.

The origin of the separation of the estate appeared to have been an award of the then Rajah of Benares, made in April 1819, by which a large part of the possessions of the family of the parties was divided into shares, some being allotted to D, and the others to R. The terms of the submission to the Rajah of Benares, and of his award of 1819, as also the subsequent conduct of the parties showed that their intention was that the shares specified by the Rajah should be the subjects of separate ownership.

———Assertion of partition in prior proceedings by one party and admission thereof by opponent.

A, the plaintiff's husband, and P, the defendant's husband, were two brothers governed by the Mithakshara law. A died first, and then P. The question was whether, prior to the death of A, separation in estate had taken place between the two brothers, and consequently, the plaintiff, as the widow of A, at his death, became entitled to half of the property which had come to A & P from their father.

In support of her case the plaintiff mainly relied upon proceedings in the Court of the Collector of dates subsequent to the death of A and prior to the death of P, in which it appeared that, in a suit for partition, there were entries and statements, from which, if they were admissible in evidence against the respondent, it might be inferred that some partition had previously been made; because there were entries which showed that the plaintiff, the widow of A, was recognised as being entitled to and having a share, which would not be consistent with the brothers having continued joint until A's death, in which case the whole of it would have descended to P.

Held, that if, at the dates of the said proceedings, P had been of sound mind and capable of managing his own affairs, and had been himself a party to those proceedings, and had made or adopted those admissions, they would have been evidence of considerable value upon the question whether a separation had been made at some previous period (379). ———Both Courts in India concur in finding that B, in Fusli 1290, built a house for himself and went to live in it with his family. He thus became separate from his brothers in food and residence. Cesser of commensality is an element which may properly be considered in determining the question whether there has been a partition of joint family property, but it is not conclusive. ———Movables and immoveables—Division of—Nature of evidence as to, required.

The appeal arose out of a suit brought by the plaintiff—appellant, as the widow of A, to recover a share in a property which formerly belonged to one B. B had two sons, A, plaintiff's husband, and P, the husband of the respondent. Plaintiff's case was that, prior to A's death, a separation in estate took place between the two brothers, and that, consequently, the plaintiff, as the widow of A, at his death, became entitled to half of the property which had come to them from B, it being admitted that the parties were governed by the Mithakshara law. The respondent's case was, that there was no separation, and that, on the death of A, the whole property devolved on P; that at P's death, she became entitled to it; and that the plaintiff, A's widow, was only entitled to maintenance.

The plaintiff's witnesses only speak of a division of moveable property; and, with regard to that, they are not consistent in their evidence. They do not agree as to what articles of moveable property were actually divided; they do not agree as to the persons who were appointed arbitrators; the person who is said to have made out the list was not called as a witness, nor were any of the persons who were said to have been arbitrators. As evidence of a partition or division of moveable property, this kind of proof is very unsatisfactory, and open to great observation. As evidence of a partition of the immoveable property, it amounts to nothing. Their Lordships think that, if the parties thought it right, according to the evidence, to make a formal partition of moveable property, and if, at or about that time, which is when it is alleged the partition took place, they were going also to divide the immoveable property, it might be expected that there would be some evidence of a formal division of it, and some trace of what was done at that time to divide immoveable property; whereas there is nothing in the evidence which indicates that the parties did anything towards dividing it, and apparently the immoveable property remained just as it was (378). ———Settlement Officer's decree for "Superior proprietary rights" in favour of widows of deceased brothers "subject to rights of other shareholders."

The respondent, claiming to be the daughter and heir of one Sheo Dayal, sued for the recovery from the appellant of a village which had been sold to appellant's predecessor in title by the two widows of Sheo Dayal, and by B, the widow of G, a brother of Sheo Dayal. The appellant pleaded, inter alia, that there had been a partition or separation in interest between Sheo Dayal and G, his brother, that, on the death of G, B became entitled to a moiety of the suit village, and that as the plaintiff was not a reversioner of G, her suit must fail as to G's moiety.

As proof of the fact that there had been such a separation, the appellant founded upon a settlement decree obtained by the three widows after the death of Sheo Dayal, whereby the Settlement Assistant Commissioner ordered that "a decree for superior proprietary rights in favour of the three widows be passed."

That decree, though in name for superior proprietary rights in favour of the widows, expressly declared that it should "be passed subject to the rights of the other shareholde.s".

It appeared that in the proceedings in which the Settlement decree was passed the property was treated as a unum quid, as ancestral, and as property to which, as an ancestral undivided property, the three widows vindicated their right.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Joint Family—Partition—Evidence of—(Contd.)

Held, that not only was the settlement decree not equivalent to an affirmation of a partition or separation having taken place, but was entirely consistent with the existence of the property as joint and undivided, and therefore with no prejudice being effected to the right of the reversioner therein, and was even sound evidence in favour of the continuance as and from that date of the property as joint and undivided (65-6).

If it be correct, as alleged by the appellant, that the property had at that time been de facto separated, and that the settlement was a de jure recognition of that fact, then the entirety of the property was disposed of, and language of reservation, or the mention of other shareholders, was hardly appropriate, but might be contended to be repugnant to the transaction which was pleaded. In the opinion of their Lordships, the terms of this decree must be looked upon as a whole. When, on the one hand, it declares for superior proprietary rights in favour of the widows, and, on the other, that these are to be given subject to the rights of the other shareholders, it completely conserves such reversionary and other ownership rights as are inherent in the succession to a joint family property, and it negatives the idea that partition or separation had been effectuated by law in such a manner as to extinguish other proprietary rights (64-5). Plaintiff sued to re-open a partition made by his grandfather and his four sons, one of whom, K, was the plaintiff's father, at a time when the plaintiff, who was K's son by his first wife, was about 4 years old. At that time K had separated from the plaintiff's mother and had married a second wife, and the plaintiff's case was that that partition was effected by all the adult members of the family with the deliberate object of defrauding him of his share in the properties which ought to have fallen to his father and himself at the partition.

Held, that the case set up by the plaintiff was in itself highly improbable and required to be established by very clear and satisfactory evidence, that the question at the root of such a case was whether the share allotted to the plaintiff's father was really inferior in value to that which was allotted to his brothers, because, if it was not, the basis of the plaintiffs' whole case failed; and that mere acreage was not a satisfactory test of value, as so much depended upon the productivity of the lands allotted to each share.

Held further, that the plaintiff had altogether failed to make out the alleged fraud. (Sir John Wallis.) SENNIMALAI GOUNDAN v. SELLAPPA GOUNDAN.

The alleged presumption against the first deed of partition, that it may have been a mere device because one member of the family was indebted, may more reasonably be removed than maintained by due attention to that fact. Such a state of things often leads to partitions, but to fair and honest ones. It would be a prudent course in the members of a joint family to prevent, by a partition, the interference of strangers in their family arrangements, and an inquiry into the state, condition, extent, and uses of their joint property; and no suggestion has been made that the partition under the first deed was unequal (303). EFFECT OF.

What may amount to a separation or what conduct on the part of some of the members may lead to disruption of the joint undivided family, and convert a joint tenancy into a tenancy-in-common, must depend on the facts of each case. A definite and unambiguous indication by one member of intention to separate himself and to enjoy his share in severalty may amount to separation. But to have that effect the intention must be unequivocal and clearly expressed. (1) (Mr. Ameer Ali) SURAJ NARAIN v. IKBAL NARAIN. (1912) 40 I. A. 40 (45) = 35 A. 80 (87) = 13 M. L. A member of a Mithakshara joint family died pending a suit for partition which he had instituted on 21st October, 1908. Held, reversing the Court below, that the deceased had unequivocally and unmistakably manifested his intention to separate himself from the defendants, the other members of the family, and to hold, possess, and enjoy his unquestioned interest separately from them, that that was sufficient, under the Hindu law, to constitute a separation and to divide him in estate from his co-parceners, and that his widow was therefore entitled to continue the suit. In a suit brought by the 1st respondent and his two minor sons for partition of the property of a joint Mithakshara family consisting of themselves and of the appellants, the question was whether the marriage expenses of the 1st respondent's sons should be provided for. At the date of the suit neither of the sons was married, but the elder (Plaintiff 2) married before the decree was made. The High Court held that the marriage expenses of plaintiff No. 2 should be provided for, as in their view the severance of the joint status took place only when the decree was made. They rejected the claim of plaintiff No. 3 (the younger son) who was unmarried at the date of the decree. The suit was instituted in January 1910 but it appeared that, as early as July, 30, 1909, the 1st respondent had served a notice upon his co-parceners unambiguously and definitely intimating his intention to separate himself and to enjoy his share in severalty.

Held, that that notice effected a separation so far as 1st respondent's branch of the family was concerned, and that no obligation rested on the joint family in respect of either of his son's marriages (173 4). (Mr. Ameer Ali.) RAMALINGA ANNAVI v. NARAYANA ANNAVI.

Joint Family—Partition—Meaning twofold of word—(Contd.)

"division of title and division of property." In the Mithakshara, Vijnaneswara defines the word "Vibhaga," which is usually rendered into English by the word "partition," as the "adjustment of divers rights regarding the whole by distributing them in particular portions of the aggregate." Mitra Misra explains in the Viramitrodaya the meaning of this passage: he shows that the definition of Vijnaneswara does not mean exclusively the division of property into specific shares as alone giving right to property, but includes the ascertainment of the respective rights of the individuals, who claim the heritage jointly. He says: "For partition is made of that in which proprietary right has already arisen, consequently partition cannot properly be set forth as a means of proprietary right. Indeed, what is effected by partition is only the adjustment of the proprietary right into specific shares." Nowhere in the Mithakshara is it stated that agreement between all the co-parceners is essential to the disruption of the joint status or that the severance of rights can only be brought about by the actual division and distribution of the property held jointly. If this were so and there were minors in a joint undivided family, partition would be impossible until they had all attained majority, a position which is expressly combated and negatived in the Viramitrodaya. In fact later writers leave no room for doubt that "separation," which means the severance of the status of jointness, is a matter of individual volition. For example, Nilakantha, the author of the Vyavahara Mayukha expressly lays down that "even when there is a total absence of common property a partition is effected by the mere declaration 'I am separate from thee,' for partition is a particular condition of the mind, and the declaration is indicative of the same." The Saraswati-Vilasa gives expression to the same view. It says: "from this it is known that without any formality partition can be effected by mere intention." The following gloss in the Viramitrodaya appears to be conclusive on the rule of law under the Mithakshara "Here again," it says, "partition at the desire of the sons," which expression includes grandsons and great-grandsons, "whether in the lifetime of the father or after his demise, may take place by the choice of a single co-parcener, since there is no distinction" (159-60). ———There is a twofold application of the word "division" in connection with a partition. In the first place, there is separation, which means the severance of the status of jointness. That is a matter of individual volition; and it must be shown that an intention to become divided has been clearly and unequivocally expressed, it may be by explicit declaration or by conduct. Secondly, there is the partition or division of the joint estate, comprising the allotment of shares which may be effected by different methods (419-20). By an agreement, two brothers agreed to refer the partition of all their ancestral and other properties to arbitrators. The award, however, divided only parts of the property referred for division, the division of the remainder being rendered impossible by reason ofthe persistent obstructiveness of plaintiff, one of the brothers. In a suit for partition brought by him in respect of all the properties of the family, as well those which had been divided by the award as those not so divided by it, held that the award so far as it made a division of the property was valid and binding on the parties (54).

If the arbitrators had effected a division of parts of the property only by their own authority only, the award might have been bad as being uncertain in its terms and incomplete, but it was competent to the parties to agree to the division being made by the arbitrators by steps and that each should be final. They might waive the condition that a complete partition must be made of the whole of the property. The ground upon which an award which does not dispose of all the matters referred has been held to be invalid appears to be that there is an implied condition that it shall do so (54) (Sir Richard Couch.) MAKUND RAM SUKAL v. SALIQ RAM SUKAL. (1894) 21 I. claiming certain other properties to be impartible and seeking complete partition of former—Subsequent throwing of latter by plaintiff into hotchpot.

In a suit for partition, the plaintiff sought a complete partition of the whole of the family property.

In his plaint, the plaintiff enumerated certain jewels in its schedules and admitted that they were in his possession; but, for some inadequate reason,he at first appeared to have considered them not liable to partition. At an early stage of the case, however, he expressed his willingness to being those jewels into hotchpot. The decree of the District Court accordingly directed a valuation and a scheme of division into two equal shares of those jewels as well as of the rest of the family property.

On objection raised in the appeal to the Privy Council that the plaintiff's failure to disclose at the outset his possession of the jewels converted the suit into one for partial partition only, and that the suit ought therefore to have been dismissed, held that there was no question of partial partition (81). The respondent, the widow of one of 4 brothers governed by the Bengal Mithakshara law, brought a suit against, inter alia, the three surviving brothers of her husband, and their mother, to determine the plaintiff's rights under a partition of family property which she alleged had taken place in her husband's lifetime, and for consequential reliefs. It appeared that at the alleged partition no share was reserved for the mother and that she did not acquiesce in the partition so made. On the strength of this circumstance the partition was urged to be invalid and the plaintiff's suit as framed to be unsustainable.

Held, that the suit being one for a declaration of rights under the partition, in which all the parties interested were represented, and in which the mother claimed her share, there was no difficulty in giving effect to her claim. Their Lordships made a declaration of her right to her share. (Sir Andrew Scoble.) CHOWDHRY GANESH DUTT THAKOOR v. JEWACH THAKOORAIN.

——Strength of presumption in case of—Circumstances counteracting—Families removed by several generations from each other—Applicability of presumption to case of.

There is no doubt a presumption that a Hindu family continues joint; but the strength of the presumption necessarily varies in every case. The presumption of union is stronger in the case of brothers than in the case of cousins, and the further you go from the founder of the family the presumption becomes weaker and weaker.

Where it appears from facts that through generations a property has been possessed in a certain single line, it can never be said that it lies upon that line to establish that it was dissociated generations ago from another line which appears on the scene as a claimant and proposes no facts of jointness, such as living in the same home, sharing in food or worship, or quoad estate participating in the enjoyment or fruits thereof. To put, in consequence of a stretch of the doctrine of onus, an unnatural and forced construction upon the actual facts of family life and development is not warranted either by the reason of the case or the law of India. ——The case for the appellants was that the 1st appellant had separated completely and effectually from his family in or about the year 1870, 27 or 28 years before his father's death in 1892, and that after his separation he acquired by his own exertions the property described in the schedule to the plaint. The case for the respondents was that the 1st appellant never completely and effectually separated from his family, and that the wealth which he subsequently acquired was merely an accretion of the family property. The question for decision was whether the 1st appellant effectually separated himself from his family or not in 1870.

———In a case in which it was undisputed that more than 40 years before, when a joint Hindu family of brothers separated in food and residence, some arrangement was come to between the brothers, whereby possession of by far the larger portion of the lands was distributed between them, it being arranged, with regard to some lands, that the rents should be collected separately according to the respective shares of the brothers, and with regard to others, that they should be in the exclusive possession of each co-proprietor, the question was whether the arrangement for exclusive collection of rent was for convenience of management only or was in pursuance of a formal partition.

The High Court held, differing from the Sub-Judge, that the arrangement was for convenience of management only and was not in pursuance of a formal partitition, relying inter alia, upon (1) the absence of any deed, document or writing in connection with such partition and (2) the fact that the plots of land, which were in the exclusive possession of the proprietors, were described in rent receipts and Zemindari papers as Kamat, which tended to show that they might have been taken without any formal division.

There was, however, some oral evidence of a formal partition, and the Sub-Judge accepted that evidence as correct and held, as stated above, that there had been a formal partition. Their Lordships restored his decision, observing that the following facts confirmed the correctness of his conclusion :—

(1) The rents for definite and specific plots of land were paid exclusively to the several proprietors for a long period up to the date of suit without dispute, and without any subsequent adjustment or distribution ;

(2) There had been not only that appropriation of rents for separate plots ; but, when some of those were compulsorily acquired for a railway in 1900, under the Land Acquisition Act, the compensation moneys were separately paid and appropriated by the separate proprietors who had been previously collecting the rents in respect of those lands ;

(3) When a record of rights was prepared of the villages which formed the property of the joint family under the Bengal Tenancy Act, and finally published in 1903, some of the suit plots were recorded as being the separate property of their respective landlords, without any dispute or controversy on the part of the others ; and

(4) The very appearance of the separate holdings, i.e., the plots from which rents were collected exclusively, on the map for the purposes of the suit, which lay, not in three compact blocks, but in many cases isolated and scattered, seemed to negative the theory that the arrangement for exclusive collection of rent was for convenience of management. ———Non-performance thereof by him and performance of same by another—Suit by latter to recover amount spent from former—Right of—Default on his part in retaining share of rents of property allotted to former—Effect.

A suit was instituted by appellant against his elder brother, S, and the son and heir of another brother for possession of his share of the ancestral property, and the mesne profits during the period of his minority was compromised by a solenamah, the fourth article of which provided that S should perform at his own expense the Deb Sheba (the worship of the idols,) and other religious ceremonies for the three, the cost of which was fixed at Rs. 2,000 a year, and that, in consideration of his so doing, he should hold possession for his life of a specified part of the joint property estimated to produce that amount. This compromise received the sanction of the Court, and it was ordered that both parties should carry out the terms of the compromise.

In a suit by the appellant in which he alleged, that by reason of the non-performance by S of the duty which he had undertaken under the fourth article of the compromise, he, the plaintiff, had been compelled to perform certain religious ceremonies at his own cost, and that he had a right of action over against S for the moneys expended in the performance of those ceremonies, it was found that the appellant did not perform his part of the agreement, that he retained his share of the rents of the land; and that S was put to take out execution under the decree founded on the compromise in order to get the funds which that compromise gave him.

Held, that the appellant had no cause of action at all (394).

Mere proof on the part of the appellant of the performance of the religious ceremonies, and of the cost to which he had been put in the performance of them would not have made out that he had any right of action. The compromise on which appellant's claim was founded, gave certain lands, and the rent of those lands, to S, coupled, we may admit, with the performance of a trust, but a trust of that nature which is constantly vested in the managing or elder brother of a Hindu family, a trust which implies some considerable beneficial interest. If the non-performance of that trust, or the non-performance of those ceremonies, could, by any possibility, give such right of action to the appellant as that asserted in his suit, it surely was necessary for him to show that it was not by reason of any default on his part that the non-performance of the trust took place (393-4). A joint Hindu family, which possessed immoveable properties in the Travancore State and in the Tinnevelly District, within the Brltish territories, agreed by a yadast to divide their properties in both places according to certain specified shares. That agreement was later given effect to in respect of the properties in Travancore. The document was registered in Travancore, and effect was given to it in respect of the properties there. No division was, however, made of the Tinnevelly properties. One of the members thereupon instituted a suit to enforce the agreement and to obtain a partition of the properties in Tinnevelly, the plaint stating that a suit would be brought in the Travancore Court to set aside the division there.

Held that, Court could not in such a suit upset the division of the Travancore properties, and that the only decree to which the plaintiff was entitled was a decree for partition of the properties in the Tinnevelly District. (Mr. Ameer Ali.) RAJANGAM AYYAR v. RAJANGAM AYYAR.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Joint Family—Partition—Separation of one member—Status of remaining members inter se on—Presumption—Onus of proof.

Prior to and in the year 1869; three brothers, G, K, and L, lived together as an undivided family and owned a shop which had been founded by their father A, at Ellichpur. At some time in 1869 or 1870, K separated from his brothers, took out his share, and started a shop of his own. There was no direct evidence of any agreement between G and L. There was also no evidence that L, drew out his share of the family property, or any part of it, and the fair inference seemed to be that L left it in the family shop, which continued to be carried on by G, under the firm name of A. G. Lall. About the time of rhe partition L sent his wife and infant son, the appellant, to reside in a place referred to as Bhorteda, and a few months afterwards he joined them there, and they then went together on a pilgrimage to Prayag where he died in 1873. Thereupon G brought the appellant's mother, and the appellant, then a lad thirteen or fourteen years of age, to his residence in Ellichpur, and they lived with him there until his death in 1882. He left one daughter, but no male issue.

The appellant thereupon brought the sait out of which the appeal arose claiming, as the survivor of a joint family, consisting of his uncle G and himself, to be sole owner of the family shop and business. The question was as to the effect of the transaction in 1869 or 1870, by which K separated from his brothers.

Held, that the onus was on the appellant of showing that on the separation of K, G and L agreed to remain united or to re-unite, that he failed to discharge that onus, and that the inference of the Court below of a partnership between G and L and afterwards the appellant, either by express agreement or by operation of law, was the hypothesis which best reconciled all the proved facts in the case (137.) In many cases it may be necessary, in order to ascertain the share of the outgoing member, to fix the shares which the other co-parceners are or would be entitled to, and in this sense the separation of one is said to be a virtual separation of all. And their Lordships think that an agreement amongst the remaining members of a joint family to remain united or to reunite must be proved like any other fact (137). Four brothers, who lived as a joint Hindu family and carried on a family business, executed a deed in 1876 by which the assets of the family were described and divided, and I, one of the brothers, was finally paid out. In 1905, R, another of the brothers died leaving a widow. There was absolutely no evidence that, on the separation of I, the other three brothers continued united or reunited as co-parcenary members of a joint Hindu family. In a suit by the widow of K against the surviving brother and the sons of the predeceased brother. held, reversing the Chief Court, and restoring the sub-Court, that on the separation of I, the family of the parties ceased to be a joint Hindu family, in other words, its members ceased to be co-parceners, and

A member of a joint Hindu family can separate himself from the other members of the joint family and is on separation entitled to have his share in the property of the joint family ascertained and partitioned off for him, and the remaining co-parceners, without any special agreement amongst themselves, may continue to be co-parceners and to enjoy as members of a joint family what remainded after such a partition of the family property. It was contended that, although the decree in the partition suit of 1868 may have effected a separation quoad Tundan and Tukan (the defendants therein), it left the plaintiffs united inter se ; and that this might have been the legal effect of the decree is undeniable. But, here, again, the conduct of the parties must be looked at in order to arrive at what constitutes the true test of partition of property according to Hindu Law, namely, the intention of the members of the family to become separate owners (9-10). ———Error in—Remedy of aggrieved party in case of—Fresh partition suit by him—Maintainability.

A co-sharer. who sues for a partition of the joint property must make the other co-sharers defendants in the suit and if a decree is passed therein giving him a portion of the property, it will be a decree in his favour and against the defendants co-sharers. Supposing any error is made in partitioning out, the remedy of the defendants co-sharers lies in proceedings in that suit suitable to correct that error; and the Code of Civil Procedure provides adequate means for the correction of such errors. And if they fail to have that error corrected by such suitable proceedings they will be estopped from subsequently questioning the validity of the decree so made.

Where, therefore, in a series of suits to which all the co-sharers were parties decrees were passed partitioning to the plaintiffs therein their respective shares of the joint property by metes and bounds, held that the decrees therein became res judicata so far as a co-sharer who was a defendant in each of those suits was concerned and that he could not thereafter allege that the property left with him after allotment to the plaintiffs in the prior suits of the properties decreed to them was insufficient to represent his share of the joint property. ———Widow of deceased coparcener - Maintenance of—Fund set apart to provide for—Rights of surviving members in, on death of widow—Reservation in decree of—Necessity—Mode of.

In a suit for partition, one of the defendants being the issueless widow of a deceased coparcener, the Sudder Court deducted from the gross amount of divisible assets the sum of Rs. 15,000 the proceeds of which were, under the decree, to be devoted to the widow's maintenance. The judgment, however, added that in respect of that sum the plaintiff was to have no right. Against the decree of the Sudder Court, the plaintiff appealed to the Privy Council complaining that he was by the decree deprived of his right to claim a share of the principal sum deducted to meet the claim of maintenance on the death of the widow. Their Lordships observed :—A court of equity, in this country, if administering the whole estate, would no doubt have carried over the sum set apart for this purpose (maintenance of the widow) to a separate account ; would have directed that the annual income should be paid to the widow during her life; and that the parties who had a reversionary interest in the principal should be at liberty to apply concerning it on her death. The country courts in India have, however no machinery which enables them to take any such course. Nor was the suit one for the general administration of the estate. It was, in form, a suit to obtain present payment of the balance which the piaintiff alleged to be due to him on the proper division of the property and adjustment of the accounts. If the court below had simply deducted the Rs. 15 000 as so much undivided residue, without saying anything about the plaintiff's future rights, their Lordships considering the form of the suit would have doubted whether he had any grounds for impeaching the decree on this point. The addition of the words in the judgment to the effect that plaintiff was to have no right in respect of the said sum of Rs. 15,000 are certainly calculated to embarrass the plaintiff, or his representatives, in asserting the right to claim a share of this sum when the purpose for which it has been deducted from the divisible assets, the maintenance of the widow, has been satisfied. Their Lordships therefore propose to add to the decree of the court below a declaration that it is to be without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff, or his representatives, to claim on the death of the widow, such share as he or they may be entitled to in the sum of Rs. 15,000, retained to provide for her maintenance (509-10). and demanded a partition and the allotment to him of his share of the joint family property, that B advised him to continue joint and not to demand a separate share, that B promised to arrange an advance of money for N, and took him to S, and that he obtained a sum of Rs. 1,500 from S. In July 1910, N executed a sale-deed conveying his share in the joint family property to S for the sum of Rs. 1,500. The sale-deed recited, inter alia, "About a year ago I came to Poona and asked my uncles and my step-brothers to effect a partition and to allot to me my one-ninth share of our ancestral property. But they refused to give (my) share."

On a question arising as to whether the recitals in the said sale-deed were or were not admissible against the defendants (the other members of the family) on the issue whether N demanded a share of the property in 1909, held that the sale-deed was some evidence of the act alleged to have been done in pursuance of N's interview with B, and that it was material on the question whether the evidence of N and his witnesses on that part of the the case could be relied upon.

Semble this particular statement (the recital in the sale deed set out above) does not come within S. 157 of the Evidence Act on the ground that it was made at or about the time of N's alleged interview with B in 1909.

Held further that apart from the particular recital in the deed as to the interview with N's uncles about a year before the deed itself was material corroboration of the plaintiff's case and was admissible in evidence. ———Partner—Joint family member—Suit on bases of—Distinction—Test.

To show that the plaintiff (in a suit for partition) did not sue as one of the co-sharers of a joint and undivided family, but as an ordinary partner, the defendant relied on the phrase "The claim is brought in virtue of right of co-partnership," at the commencement of the plaint, and the use of the word "partnership" in other parts of the pleadings and also on the circumstance that the plaintiff claimed a lesser share than he would have been entitled to under the Hindu Law of succession.

Held that the presumption arising from this misstatement of plaintiff's rights as co-sharer in an undivided Hindu estate was by no means conclusive, especially as the claim made was also inconsistent with the hypothesis of a partnership governed by the rules which regulated the rights of mercantile partners as such inter se (504).

In view of the whole scope of the pleadings, held further that the plaintiff's claim was really based upon his alleged rights as a co-sharer, in a joint and undivided Hindu estate, and that, as such, it was sufficiently well pleaded (504-5). ———Illegitimacy of brothers—Claim before Privy Council on foot of—Maintainability.

The plaintiff was the widow of one of the sons of P, and the 1st defendant the widow of another son of P. In both the Courts below and indeed up to the moment when the plaintiff's case was lodged in the appeal to the Privy Council the plaintiff insisted upon the legitimacy of her husband and his brother. It was, however, found that both the sons were illegitimate sons of P. At the hearing of the appeal to the Privy Council, the plaintiff for the first time contended that, assuming that both her husband and the husband of the 1st defendant were illegitimate sons of P, they could yet inherit from one another, and that she was therefore entitled to succeed.

Held that the appeal could not be maintained on a ground so inconsistent with all the previous proceedings in the case (182).

The plaintiff might have originally framed her case in the alternative, so as to claim heirship if the disputed issue of legitimacy was decided against her. Then the case would have been tried with reference to that contention, and all facts ascertained, aud researches into the law conducted accordingly. The question cannot be regarded as one of pure law. Indeed in cases of this kind which may involve subtle and difficult questions of personal status, it is not easy to say what matters of fact would have to be ascertained for the proper decision of each proposition of law. One may be specified. The question whether two brothers can inherit from one another, because they are equal in point of illegitimacy, could not properly be tried without knowing how they stand relatively in point of caste. It is indeed clear that to lay down a rule of inheritance between rival claimants without a trial of the case in view of that rule may involve serious risk of miscarriage (183). Assuming that the High Court are correct in finding that the child, although born after marriage, was procreated or begotten before marriage took place, their Lordships are of opinion that that Court came to a right conclusion, in point of law, that the child was legitimate (292—3)

It does not appear, from the authorities cited, to have been distinctly laid down that, according to Hindu Law, in order to render a child legitimate the procreation as well as the birth must take place after marriage. That would be a most inconvenient doctrine. If it is the law, that law must be administered. Their Lordships, however do not think that it is the Hindu Law. They said that S and W were also his heirs. The answers then obtained from them with the evidence of the same persons at the trial were received by the Court as proving the legitimacy of S and W.

LEGITIMATION—DISTINCTION.

———Systems in which legitimation found.

Legitimacy is a status which results from certain facts. Legitimation is a proceeding which creates a status which did not exist before. In the proper sense there is no legitimation under the Mahomedan Law Examples of it may found in other systems, The adoption of the Roman and the Hindu law effected legitimacy. The same was done under the Canon Law and the Scotch Law in respect of what is known as legitimation per subsequens matrimonium. An acknowledgment of legitimacy under the Mahomedan law is a declaration of legitimacy and not a legitimation. A declaration, though it cannot be withdrawn, may be contradicted, for it is only a statement; legitimation is an act, which being done cannot be undone. PRESUMPTION AGAINST.

———Inheritance of father and his undivided brother—Exclusion from—Presumption from.

The plaintiffs, the sons of one Lall Singh, alleged that he was the son of Mohun Singh, that Mohun Singh was the brother of Tara Singh, the last male owner of the suit properties, and that they were, therefore, entitled to succeed to the properties of Tara Singh on the death of his widow, Maha Koer. The question was whether the plaintiffs had established the legitimacy of either Mohan Singh, or Lall Singh.

The illegitimacy of the said two persons was alleged by Maha Koer as early as 1837. The evidence showed that they did not share the family property with Tara Singh, that they did not succeed to it on the death of Tara Singh, but that Maha Koer excluded them and held sole possession in succession to her husband. The plaintiffs gave no evidence of the legitimacy of their ancestors.

Held, that the presumption of the illegitimacy of the said two persons was almost irresistible (536).

The proved exclusion of Mohan Singh and of Lall Singh would raise a strong presumption of their spurious birth (539). (Sir Edward V. Williams.) JOWALA BUKSH v. DHARUM SINGH. (1866) 10 M. I. A. 511=2 Sar. 189.

The leading improbability on the other side is that the Maharajah should have acknowledged and treated spurious children as his own. It was strongly urged that it was not possible that such children could have been palmed upon him in the manner described, and equally impossible to suppose that he would knowingly have connived at such a fraud, and especially at the introduction into his family of a boy of low or unknown caste to be the successor to the Raj. Such a successor would have been revolting to his pride as a Prince of an ancient family, and to his religious feeling as a Hindoo. His conduct in acknowledging the children was relied upon as cogent, if not conclusive, evidence of their ———Right to—Demand and refusal—Proof of—Necessity—Wrongful withholding—Presumption of, from non-payment.

In order to recover arrears of maintenance it is not necessary to prove a demand for each year's maintenance as it became payable. On the contrary, while non-payment of maintenance to a person entitled thereto does not necessarily give him a right of action for arrears, it constitutes prima facie proof of wrongful withholding. It is only upon a full consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case that it is possible to decide whether such prima facie proof has been rebutted (159). ———Alienability of—Property granted impartible.

The question for decision was whether the fact that the grant of the suit property, made originally by the then head of the family to his son, was admittedly a babuana grant rendered the property inalienable by the son of the original grantee, to whom it had descended. It was conceded that the lands, or usufructs, granted by the babuana grant in question were impartible—descendible to the eldest male heirs of the grantee to be held, or managed, by the person to whom they descended for the maintenance of the family—and that, on failure of male descendants, they reverted to the raj and became the property of the holder of the raj for the time being, or that the interest granted then ceased to exist, whatever it might be; and further, that meanwhile the Government revenue should be paid by the grantee, or the person to whom the property should descend through the holder of the raj. There was no provision, express or implied, in the grant that the interest granted should be inalienable.

Held, that it did not follow from the fact that the property granted was impartible that it was inalienable, and that, in the absence of some special family custom regulating its enjoyment, the property granted under such a grant was alienable.

The result of the authorities as to the right to alienate is: In cases governed by the Mithakshara law, a father may sell or mortgage not only his own share but his sons' shares in family property, in order to satisfy an antecedent debt of his own, not being of an immoral or illegal character, and . . . such transaction may be enforced against his sons by a suit and by proceedings in execution to which they are not parties.

Notwithstanding the impartibility of property granted by a babuana grant, it comes apparently, in the absence of some special family custom regulating its enjoyment, within this principle. (Lord Atkinson.) DURGADUT SINGH v. RAMESHWAR SINGH BAHADUR.

———Will creating—What amounts to.

By his will a Hindu expressed his hopes that his wives and his sons would all live amicably together, and that all would look upon and consider his eldest son as the head of his family after his death. He then bequeathed the whole of his property, real and personal, to his eldest son, directing him to provide for both of his wives and to pay them proper respect, and to provide also for his younger brothers and for the testators' dependants; and he declared that he had made those provisions with a view to prevent dissensions in the family, and to enable them to live in peace and harmony after his decease. If, however, the younger sons should not feel disposed to abide by those directions, and should insist upon a separation from the family, then the will provided that the eldest son was to receive the rents of two villages mentioned in the will, and pay over the proceeds to his younger brothers as such proceeds were from time to time received, and he was further to pay to each the sum of Rs. 25,000. The testator then gave Rs. 13,000 for the benefit of his grand-daughter, the daughter of the eldest son of the testator, on her marriage, and allotted Rs, 40,000 for what he called the customary outlay in the first year after his death, including religious pilgrimages. The will then proceeded:—"Nana, the eldest son, shall provide for both the mothers, treating them with great respect; and he shall regard each of his two younger brothers as a son, providing for them, and my old servants, in a manner befitting their several conditions in life."

Held, that, on the proper construction of the will, it did not create a right in favour of the widows of the testator which was a specific "charge on the inheritance of any estate" within the meaning of the words in sub-section 13 of S. 1 of the Limitation Act of 1859, and that a suit brought by one of the widows against the eldest son of the testator for maintenance and arrears under the will was not barred after the expiration of 12 years from the testator's death ———Residence in family house of deceased if a condition of.

The real question is whether to be of the family the concubine, otherwise entitled to mainteance, must reside in the same house with the deceased together with his wife and the regular members of the family. Their Lordships are of opinion that such common residence is now unnecessary, whatever may have been the case when the concubine was a slave of the household (162).

Provided the concubinage be permanent, until the death of the paramour, and sexual fidelity to him be preserved, the right to maintenance is established, although the concubine be not be kept in the family house of the deceased. This incident of residence in the family house was not the essential reason for the right to have maintenance from the goods of the deceased paramour, but rather a means of ensuring the qualified chastity of the mistress (162-3).

CO-PARCENARY UNDER MITHAKSHARA LAW—RIGHT BASED ON.

———Beginning and end of.

In an ordinary joint family ruled by the Mithakshara law the junior members, down to three generations from the head of the family, have a co-parcenary interest accruing by birth in the ancestral property. This co-parcenary interest carries with it the inchoate right to raise an action of partition, and until partition is de facto accomplished these same persons have a right of maintenance. This right is an inherent quality of the right of co-parcenary—that is, of common property. The individual enjoyment of the common property being ousted by the management of the head of the family, they have a right till they exercise their right to divide, to be maintained out of the property which is common to them, who are excluded from the management, and to the head of the family who is invested with the management. As it is expressed by the late Mr. Mayne, "those who would be entitled to share in the bulk of the property are entitled to have all their necessary expenses paid out of its income" (153).

The right to maintenance, so far as founded on or inseparable from the right of co-parcenary, begins where co-parcenary begins and ceases where co-parcenary ceases (153). (Lord Dunedin.) RAMA RAO v. RAJA OF PITTAPUR.

———Construction of—Maintenance—Means of—Failure to provide with—Condition as to—Meaning and effect of, in case of person already maintained by grantor—Failure to provide at all or failure to provide as at time of grant.

A deed executed in 1778 by the ancestor of the defendant in favour of 4 members of the family to which the appellants belonged was in these terms :—

" For as much as from the days of the Maharajahs, my deceased ancestors, you have all along been supported in various ways (such as) by service in my kingdom and by (grants of) villages and lands; and as I too am supporting you in the same manner,... (I have determined that) a means of support, that is, a perpetual wage should be given to you ; and in case in my time or in the time of my descendants, you or your descendants should not be supported in various ways (by me or by my descendants), then, as a means of maintenance, that is to say, as wages, I do hereby assign to you seven villages, namely,..... in the nature of a fixed (perpetual) remuneration. However, as you are now being supported by (the profits derived from) three villages and by other means, for this reason four villages have not been made over to you. Those three villages that are now in your possession by virtue of farming leases, of leases for a fixed period, and of charitable grants (you will now hold), and you will pay rent for them, and other dues on account of them, as you have done from heretofore. If ever in the time of my descendants you are not provided with the means of maintenance (by them), then let those descendants of yours who may be living at that time produce this deed, and taking possession of the three above-mentioned villages, and also of the four villages (now held) khos (by me), enjoy possession of them rent-free from generation to generation."

The appellants contended that by the terms of the deed each successive Raja was under an obligation, either to maintain them, and that not merely by grants of land. but by employing them on his estate and paying them wages, or to give them the four villages named in the deed; and accordingly, that the conditional grants to descendants became at once operative in their favour, when the late Rajah had dismissed the first appellant from his service in 1876, and declined to employ either him or any other of the appellants.

Held, over-ruiing the contention, that the contingency upon which the disposition of the four villages depended, was the failure of the Rajah to provide maintenance, and that no claim could lie so long as the appellants had sufficient means of maintenance derived from the holders of the Raj (154).

The words "If ever in the time of my descendants you are not provided with the means of maintenance" must be given their primary and natural meaning. There is nothing in the context which suggests that the condition which they express must be qualified by the previous narrative of the means by which the four named grantees had actually been supported (154). ———Father—Cash allowance to—Grant of—Duration of—Life of grantor only.

Plaintiff was a partner in trade with his grandfather, father, and uncles. A deed of dissolution was prepared and executed by the plaintiff's partners; but the plaintiff hesitated to sign the deed. The defendants carried on business in partnership. They employed the plaintiff's firm or his father, as one of the firm, to transact their Meccundum business, and they were consulted about the dissolution. For some reason they were desirous that the dissolution should take place as arranged, and were willing to give the plaintiff some benefit to induce him to agree. Negotiations between them resulted in a letter written by defendants to plaintiffs ; and on the same day the plaintiff signed a dissolution deed. The letter written by the defendants to plaintiff read as follows :—"In consideration of your having at our request signed the agreement of dissolution of partnership we hereby agree to pay you on behalf of your father a sum of rupees 500 per month, until such time as your father makes provision for your maintenance, so as to give thereby himself the above sum every month for such maintenance."

Held on a construction of the letter, that the liability of the defendants to pay the Rs. 500 a month to the plaintiff came to an end on the death of his father.

The language of the contract pointed strongly to the life of the intended or supposed grantor, viz., the father, as the limit of the grant. ———Gift or lease oral and for indefinite duration—Duration of—Gift or lease for life or resumable either at pleasure of lessor or upon notice—Evidence.

The question for decision was whether a lease or gift made orally, and for indefinite duration, by the plaintiff (respondent) to the defendant (appellant), was a lease for life, or a lease or gift resumable either at the pleasure of the lessor or upon notice.

The parties stood in the relation of mother and daughter, and the circumstances under which the gift was made were these : The mother (plaintiff) was the talookdar of a talook containing a number of villages. The daughter married, and became a widow. For some time she lived with her husband's family. She then quarrelled with them, and it would seem that they deprived her of her share of the husband's property, upon which she came to her mother in destitute circumstances, and her mother gave her the property in question by way of maintenance. The parties belonged to the tribe of Ahbans. who appeared to be Mahomedans, but with several customs of their own ; and it would seem that their law of inheritance and their law of maintenance were tribal laws.

There was evidence in the case to the effect that where a gift was made by way of maintenance it was a gift resumable by the grantor, and upon that evidence the Courts below held that by the tribal custom of the parties the right to resumption existed.

Their Lordships affirmed the judgments below (136). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse). NAJBAN BIBI v. CHAND BIBI.

The respondent, an Oudh talookdar, sued the appellant, the son of J, for recovery of possession of two villages situated within the respondents' taluk, praying, in the alternative, that the appellant was bound to relieve the respondent of the revenue payable to Government in respect of those two villages. The ground of action alleged in the plaint was that the title upon which J held possession of the villages was a grant for maintenance resumable by the talukdar upon his decease.

In point of fact, the villages in question were successively possessed by J's father and by J, from a period long antecedent to the date of the Mutiny ; and, during the possession, revenue duty was invariably paid by the talukdar. Disputes having arisen on the re-settlement of the taluka after the Mutiny between the respondents' father the then talukdar, and J, they submitted their disputes to the British Indian Association of Oudh, who made an award which found "that the two villages given as maintenance, be decreed in favour of the plaintiff" (J) " (to continue) as heretofore." The award did not expressly state whether J was to take by succession the same right of possession which had been previously enjoyed by his father and grandfather. At the hearing of the suit the appellant produced two pottahs of 1804 and 1808 (which had been produced by J before the British India Association of Oudh) granted to J's father by respondent's then ancestor. Those pottahs were indefinite in terms, and they did not state whether the grant was confined to a right for maintenance, and whether such grants if given for maintenance only, were to J's father personally, or were to be inherited by his descendants.

Held, however, on the evidence of possession had under the grants and on the other evidence in the case, that the original grants to J's father, although intended for maintenance only, were not limited to him personally, but were in reality grants to him and his direct lineal descendants through males in the order of primogeniture, and, consequently, that the villages would not revert to the talukdar, until the line of descendants had become extinct.

Held further, that one of the incidents of possession under the grant was that the burden of paying revenue for the two villages fell upon the talukdar. (Lord Watson.) BHAIYA ARDAWAN SINGH v. RAJAH UDEY PARTAB SINGH. (1896) 23 I. A. 64=23 C, 838= 7 Sar. 24=6 M. L. J. 79.

———Revenue payable on property subject of—Charge in respect of, on other properties of grantor and on properties granted by him to third parties—Declaration of—Suit by grantee for—Maintainability—Specific Relief Act, S. 42.

The holder of a taluk granted certain villages appertaining to the taluk to a junior member of the family, L, in lieu of maintenance, it being agreed between the parties that the talukdar should pay the whole revenue and that L should enjoy the villages given to him rent free. Subsequently, by an arbitration award. K, the successor of the grantor, and the then holder of the taluk, gave other villages appertaining to the taluk to S and R for their exclusive enjoyment. In terms of that award, they obtained the registration of their names on the revenue register, notwithstanding the opposition of the grandsons of L, who had died in the interval. Thereupon L's grandsons sued S, R and K for a declaration that K was alone liable for the Government revenue of the villages granted to L, a declaration that the villages granted to S and R were subject to a charge for the payment of the said Government revenue, and a declaration that the said Government revenue was a charge on each and every village of the taluka.

K did not deny his liability for the Government revenue payable in respect of the villages granted to L. There was no allegation that he had not ample property to pay the same. Nor was there any allegation that any contingency had arisen which actually jeopardised the possession by the plaintiffs of the villages granted to L.

Held, that the plaint disclosed no cause of action, and that the action was, therefore, wholly misconceived (164).

Quaere, whether the suit brought with the object of obtaining a mere declaration that the liability to pay the revenue of the villages granted to L was a charge on the taluq was maintainable in view of the provisions of S. 42 of the Specific Relief Act. A Hindu executed a document called a danpatra in favour of his married sister, S. By the document he declared that he did of his own free will make a gift to S of an eight share of a mouzah for her maintenance. The document contained the following words:—

"You shall annually pay Rs. 3,611-4-2, the annual Government revenue of the said moiety to the Collectorate of R, and get your name registered to the extent of the said amount of Government revenue, and enjoy possession during your lifetime. On your death, your husband, sons, grandsons, and other heirs in succession will continue to enjoy and possess. The power to dispose of by gift or sale will successively vest in your husband, sons, grandsons, and others."

Held that, on the true construction of the deed, S took an heritable estate (184).

The words "on your death your husband, sons, grandsons and other heirs in succession will continue to enjoy and possess" are sufficient to shew that the heirs were to succeed as such, notwithstanding that those who would take as heirs are named in wrong order, or (in other words) there is an inaccurate enumeration of them. Held that that presumption had no application to a case in which the interest created in favour of the step-mother was, not by way of a transaction following a decree of the Court, but as the result of a transaction of a voluntary nature entered into by the step-sons and the step-mother with considerations pro and contra, and the lady was made in point of fact responsible for a definite share of the debts as well as being made entitled to a definite share of the assets of her late husband. MITHAKSHARA LAW—MAINTENANCE RIGHT UNDER.

———Basis of—Relationship—Proprietary interest—Persons entitled by reason of.

There are, however, certain persons who, as is explained by the express texts of the Mithakshara, while not entitled to succeed as co-owners, are given rights of maintenance. There is the category of persons who by reason of personal disqualification are not allowed to inherit. Such are the idiot, the blind from birth, the mad man, etc. Such persons are debarred from the rights of co-parcenary, but are given maintenance in lieu. That this is owing not to denial of their birth status, but to a personal disqualification preventing enjoyment, is clear by the fact that the children of such persons, being within the allowed degrees and not themselves stigmatized with the personal defect, get by their birth the full status of co-parcenary (153-4).

There must also be added another class, equally the subject of special texts. The right of this class to maintenance lies in personal relationship, but is limited to the widow, the parent, and the infant child. It does not include the grandson. It is obvious that so far as certain individuals are concerned this category overlaps the first. But it is an obligation which is independent of the fact of there being ancestral or joint family property. It is an obligation attaching to the individual. These categories exhaust the classes of persons who have such a right to maintenance under the Mithakshara law (154). (Lord Dunedin). RAMA RAO v. RAJA OF PITTAPUR. PROPERTY ALLOTTED FOR, WITHOUT POWER OF TRANSFER—ATTACHMENT AND SALE OF.

———Validity—Decree-holder's remedy in case of.

Under a compromise between the judgment-debtor and his brother, the judgment-debtor was declared to have a right of maintenance in certain villages enumerated, the right being conferred expressly "without power of transfer."

Held that the judgment-debtor's right in the villages was, under S. 60 (n) of Civil Procedure Code of 1908, neither attachable nor saleable.

The proper remedy lies, in a fitting case, in the appointment of a Receiver for realising the rents and profits of the property paying out of the same a sufficient and adequate sum for the mainienance of the judgment-debtor and his family, and applying the balance, if any, to the liquidation

The amount of the property, doubtless, is an element in determining the sufficiency of a maintenance, but it cannot be regarded as the criterion. Other circumstances, and even the position or conduct of the claimant (speaking generally and not of the particular claimant) may reduce the maintenance.

In this case, the respondent, whilst suing for a declaration that the dispositions in his father's will were void, also asked for maintenance during the continuance of the life-estate of the appellant. The respondent admitted a marriage gift of his father of real property, producing at the time Rs. 7,000 per annum, which, prima facie, was an adequate maintenance. His averment of its insufficiency was not that it was in fact unreasonable or inadequate, but only that it was insufficient "considering the amount and value of the said P. T.'s" (father's) "property."

Held, that if the plaint were considered well-founded in that respect, a son not provided for might compel a frugal father, who had acquired large means by his own exertions, to allow a larger maintenance than he himself was satisfied to live upon, and than children living as part of his own family must be content with (82-3). ———Practice as regards.

Mr. Justice Kemp thinks that Hindu marriages are usually arranged so that there is a difference considerably more than one or two years between the ages of the husband and wife; and their Lordships think this is more probable and reasonable. It is to be expected, both for physical and moral reasons, that marriages should be arranged so that the husband, when called upon to receive his wife for permanent cohabitation, should have attained the full age of adolescence, and also the age which the law fixes as that of discretion (78). Held, that the members of the Zemindar's family were such witnesses as a Court would ordinarily desire to hear on a question of the kind in issue before it, and would be most disposed to trust (351). Before applying the presumption of marriage arising from cohabitation with habit and repute, it is necessary to make sure that the conditions necessary for its existence do exist. English and oriental customs differ widely as regards the relations of the sexes. Among most English people, open cohabitation in many classes of society of itself sets up, as a matter of fact, a repute of marriage. But in countries where customs are different it is necessary to be more discriminating, more especially owing to the laxity with which the word "wife" is used by witnesses in regard to connections not reprobated by opinion but not constituting marriage. The question was whether a lady, the mother of the 2nd defendant, was the lawfully married wife of a deceased poligar. It was proved that the lady had been carried to the poligar's palace for the purpose of being married; and she gave her own evidence in the case, and swore to the fact of a marriage having taken place. There was no evidence whatever to shew that her parents ever complained that she had not been married, or that she was detained in the palace by the deceased poligar against her will, or that he had taken her there under pretence of marrying her and had then refused to do so.

Held that, if the case were true that the deceased poligar had not married the lady, one would expect that some evidence would have been given to shew that the father and mother of the lady had complained of the manner in which their daughter had been treated, and that they had been deceived in allowing her to go to the palace, under the pretence that she was to be married (291). There is some express evidence as to the marriage having taken place, and there is no doubt whatever that the lady, the mother of the second defendant, was taken to the palace of his father for the purpose of being married. It may be taken as a fact that the marriage was interrupted, but there is evidence from which it may be presumed that, notwithstanding that interruption, a marriage did take place between the father and the mother of the second defendant prior to his birth (288). Further, we have the admission of the late Zemindar that the second defendant was his brother, and we have also the admission of the plaintiff (the widow of the late Zemindar), and his other widows, that the second defendant was the son of the lawfully married wife of his father (291). The question was as to the law of inheritance applicable to the family of the parties, whether it was the Bengal or the Mythila law. R was the last male owner.

The parties were members of a family of Bengali Soodra Satgops, which had migrated, at a remote period, from the district of Burdwan, in the south-western part of Bengal, to the district of Poornea. The properties the succession to which was in question in the cause were situate in Poornea in the north of the province of Bengal. The court below found upon the evidence that the family had adopted and performed their religious rites and ceremonies, according to the law of Mythila, and held that the Mythila law governed the descent of its property,

Their Lordships affirmed the decision of the court below (290-1).

So far from there being anything in the facts before us which is inconsistent with the conclusion of the Court below, the most important fact appears to us to be consistent with it, and only consistent with it. On the death of the father of R, R and P his brother, became joint proprietors, and entered into possession of the suit estate. P died, leaving a widow, and, according to the Bengal Law, the widow of P would have been entitled, under those circumstances, to succeed to the share of P for her life. It appears, however, that R, upon the death of P, presented a petition, stating his title as a title to the whole estate, and that he was let into possession of it, and that she was entitled to maintenance out of it, according to the Mythila law, and that that maintenance was preserved to her. Again, upon the death of R, the appellant herself presented a petition, and she claimed, under the will (which she alleged that the deceased R had executed in her favour but which has been found against), the whole of the property of R. It seems, therefore, clear that, upon the death of P and upon the death of R, the succession was regulated by the Mythila Law, and not by the Bengal Law. When a family governed by the Hindu Law of succession emigrate from India to another country, and, being themselves Mahomedans, settle among Mahomedans, the presumption that they have accepted the law of the people whom they have joined seems to be one that should be much more readily made. All that has to be shown is that they have so acted as to raise the inference that they have cut themselves off from their old environments. The analogy is that of a change of domicil on settling in a new country rather than the analogy of a change of custom on migration within India. The question is simply one of the proper inference to be drawn from the circumstances (41). (Viscount Haldane.) ABDURAHIM HAJI ISMAIL MITHU v. HALIMABAI. (1915) 43 I. A. 35 = 20 C. W. ———Mahratta Brahmin whose original abode was Bombay—Property of, in Central Provinces—Succession to—Question as to.

The question was as to the law governing the succession to the estate of B, who died, leaving amongst other properties, two mouzas situated in the Wardha district of the Central Provinces. It was found that B was a Maharashtra Brahman, though it was not known whether B had himself emigrated, or whether his ancestors had done so. There was no trace of evidence that B had ever renounced the law as expounded in Bombay, that is, the law of his original abode. The Courts below, treating the question as one of domicil, found that the deceased had his real domicil in the Central Provinces, and held that the law prevailing in the Central Provinces governed the succession.

Held that that was not the way to approach the subject.

The question was not one of domicil; the family of B was subject to the law as expounded in Bombay and as there was no trace of renunciation of that law, it continued to govern the succession to B's estate (219-21). (Lord Dunedin). BALWANT RAO v. BAJI RAO.

———Original abode—Law of—Retention of—Evidence of.

A Hindu family migrated many generations before the date of suit from Mithila, where the Mithakshara law was prevalent at the time of the migration, and continued to prevail at the date of the suit, and settled in Bengal, where the Dayabhaga prevailed. In a suit relating to the right to succeed to property belonging to a member of that family and wholly situate in Bengal, it appeared that the family came to Bengal attended by Ministers of religion, and continued joint, retaining their customs, usages, and religious observances, as before their migration, according to the doctrines of the Mithakshara. On a question arising as to which law was applicable to the case, the Mithakshara or the Dayabhaga, held that the former, and not the latter, the lex loci, was the governing authority to determine the right of succession.

From the admissions in the pleading and from the evidence, it may be safely concluded that this family came from a part of India where the Mithakshara was and is the governing authority; that it came not unattended by Ministers of religion, and that it originally continued in Bengal its ancient law. As, at the time of that migration, the Mahomedan was the governing power, and as the Hindus were rather connived at than sanctioned by the governing power in the exercise of their religion, their law was in the nature of a personal usage or custom, and it is probable that migratory families, or tribes amongst Hindus would retain their own usages (95-96). This, indeed, is not decisive of the question as to the devolution of property in the family by right of succession, since a family might retain its religious rights, and yet acquiesce in a devolution of property in the common course of descent of property in that district, amongst persons of the same race. But still there is in the Hindu law so close a connection between their religion and their succession to property, that the preferable right to perform the Sraddh is commonly viewed as governing also the question of the preferable right to succession of property; and as a general rule they would be expected to be found in union. Now, it is proved by the Purohit, the proper witness to be adduced for the purpose, that the surviving member of the family performed the Sraddh of his deceased cousin, and that proof is not opposed by counter-proof. It is a fact, which, unexplained, bears strongly on the question of the right to the succession being under the Mithakshara, and should have inclined the scale in favour of that side (which contended that the Mithakshara continued to apply), especially when it is remembered that a presumption existed in favour of the continuance of the ancient family custom (96-7). ———Original abode—Law of, as it was at time of emigration—Applicability of—Customs subsequent becoming incorporated in that law—Binding nature of.

The law of succession is in any given case to be determined according to the personal law of the individual whose succession is in question. If nothing is known about a man except that he lived in a certain place, it will be assumed that his personal law is the law which prevails in that place. In that sense only is domicil of importance. But if more is known, as for example, that he was an immigrant, then in accordance with that knowledge his personal law must be determined; unless it can be shown that he has renounced his original law in favour of the law of the place to which he migrated (219). The law which, subject to renunciation, governs an emigrated family, is the law of the original abode as it was when the family left it. A subsequent judgment declaratory of the law of the original abode as having always been would bind; but it would be a different thing if subsequent customs became incorporated in the law (222). ———Education of—Father's right of—Delegation of—Revocability of—Revocation of—Court's interference to prevent—Conditions.

Under the Hindu law, as under the English, a father may in the exercise of his discretion as guardian, entrust the custody and education of his minor children to another, but the authority he thus confers is essentially a revocable authority, and if the welfare of the children require it, he can, notwithstanding any contract to the contrary, take such custody and education once more into his own hands. If, however, the authority has been acted upon in such a way as, in the opinion of the Court exercising the jurisdiction of the Crown over infants, to create associations or give rise to expectations on the part of the infants which it would be undesirable in their interests to disturb or disappoint, such Court will interfere to prevent its revocation (321). ———Mother becoming convert—Right of—Question as to—Wishes of minor (young girl) to remain with mother and to follow her religion—Value of.

A girl was the issue of a Christian marriage between the appellant and her deceased husband, who was a Christian. On the death of her husband, the appellant professed to become a Mahomedan, and contracted a marriage in the Mahomedan form with one J, who was himself a Christian and was the husband in Christian marriage of a living Christian wife, but who professed to become a Mahomedan for the purpose of contracting a marriage with the appellant. The girl, who had till the alleged second marriage of the appellant been brought up and educated as a Christian girl, was thereafter introduced to a Moulvie who confirmed her in her alleged resolution to become a Mahomedan and to adopt the Oriental mode of feminine life in seclusion behind the purdah. Thereupon an application was made by the relatives of the girl to remove her from the custody and guardianship of the appellant on the ground that by reason of the alleged second Mahomedan marriage of the appellant, her home had become a Mahomedan home and she was no longer fit to be guardian of the infant.

At the hearing of the application, the girl, who had attained the age of 14 years, or thereabout, was herself examined, and, in her deposition, she expressed a wish to remain with the appellant and to become a Mahomedan like her, rather than continue a Christian and go to a strange Christian school. The Judges of the High Court did not think that deposition sufficient to induce them to abstain from making an order removing the girl from the custody of the appellant, and they accordingly made an order removing the girl from the custody and guardianship of the appellant.

Held, that the Judges of the High Court were right in refusing to attach any weight to the girl's deposition (327-8).

It would be very easy, of course, for a mother, under such circumstances, to procure from a young daughter the expression of a wish to remain with her and to become a Mahomedan like her, rather than continue a Christian and go to a strange school (328). In a case in which the High Court thought fit to remove the minor daughter of a deceased Christian from the custody and guardianship of her mother, who had professed to become a Mahomedan and to contract a second marriage in the Mahomedan form, and to place the infant under a Christian guardian, their Lordships suggested, for the consideration of the Court in India in similar cases, that while selecting a school for the minor it would be desirable, where practicable, to have some independent person as guardian, to whom the ward could apply, in whom the Court and the ward could confide, and whose duty it would be to communicate to the Court any matter which might arise (329). A Hindu father, who had entrusted the custody and education of his infant sons to the defendant, purported to revoke the authority delegated by him to the defendant, and instituted a suit against the defendant praying for a mandatory order directing the defendant to take possession of the persons of the infants then in England, bring them to India, and hand them over to the plaintiff. At the date of the suit the two infant sons were respectively 17 and 14 years old.

Held that, in view of the age of the infants any attempt on the part of the defendant to comply with the order prayed for would, if the infants had refused to return to India, have been contrary to the law of England, and would have at once exposed the defendant to proceedings in England on writ of habeas corpus, and that no Court ought to make an order which might lead to those consequences (322-3).

The most which a Court of competent jurisdiction in India could do under circumstances such us existed in the present case was to order the defendant to concur with the plaintiff as the infants' guardian in taking proceedings in England to regain the custody and control of his sons (323). During appellant's minority his estate was under the management of the Court of Wards. The defendant, who was a lessee from the Court of Wards of a share of an ancestral village appertaining to appellant's estate, instituted in the Settlement Court a claim for birt tenure against appellant, then a minor. One T, alleging himself to be mukhtar of the Court of Wards, made a verbal admission of the claim, whereupon a decree by admission was passed for birt tenure in favour of the defendant. Appellant, on attaining majority, sued to recover the village, alleging that T was not competent to make an admission of the claim, and that the decree of the Settlement Court was not binding upon the appellant.

Held that the onus was on the defendant to prove that T had authority to consent to a decree in that way, that the manager under the Court of Wards was authorized by the Court of Wards to give T authority to make the admission, and that it was not sufficient that T was the mukhtar of the Court of Wards and said he had authority to admit the birt right.

It is necessary that one who rests his case on a decree made by consent against an infant should show that the consent was given by some body having authority to bind the infant. It was not sufficient for a decision against the appellant that the Court of Wards was defendant and on its behalf an appearance was put in by a person who represented himself to be, and was accepted by the Settlement Officer as being the mukhtar or agent of the Court of Wards. ———Deed of—Execution of—Capacity in regard to—"Proprietor and heir"—Description of guardian as—Effect.

On the death of a Hindu, leaving a widow and infant son, the latter succeeded to the estate of his deceased father. During the minority of the son, his mother executed a mortgage mortgaging the estate to which the son had succeeded. In the deed of mortgage the widow was described as "proprietor" and "heir". The question arose whether, on the right construction of the deed and under all the circumstances of the case, she ought to be deemed to have executed the deed in her character of the real beneficial owner of the estate or in her character of manager or guardian of her infant son and heir.

Held, dissenting from the Court below, that she must be deemed to have executed the deed only in her capacity of manager or guardian of her infant son and heir (412).

It is not suggested that she ever claimed any beneficial interest in the estate as proprietor; had she done so, it would have been, pro tanto, a claim adverse to her son; and it is conceded that she did not claim adversely to her son. The acts of the mother cannot, therefore, be reasonably viewed otherwise than as acts done on behalf of another, whatever description she gave to herself, or others gave to her. She must be viewed as a Manager, inaccurately and erroneously described as "proprietor", or "heir." ———Necessity for—Proof of — Onus—Nature of proof required—Original parties alive—Original parties dead and lapse of time and enjoyment and apparent acquiescence—Cases of—Distinction.

The question on whom does the onus of proof lie in suits in which the validity as against an infant heir of a mortgage executed by his mother as his de facto guardian is brought into question. is one not capable of a general and inflexible answer. The presumption proper to be made will vary with circumstances, and must be regulated by and dependent on them. Thus, where the mortgagee himself with whom the transaction took place, is setting up a charge in his favour made by one whose title to alienate he necessarily knew to be limited and qualified, he may be reasonably expected to allege and prove facts presumably better known to him, than to the infant heir, namely, those facts which embody the representations made to him of the alleged needs of the estate, and the motives influencing his immediate loan (419). It is obvious, however, that it might be unreasonable to require such proof from one not an original party, after a lapse of time, and enjoyment and apparent acquiescence; consequently, if the charge be created by substitution of a new security for an older one, where the consideration of the older one was an old precedent debt of an ancestor not previously questioned, a presumption in favour of the validity of the charge would be reasonable (420).

The dictum in 6 Sud. Dew. N.-W. P. 218 to the effect that, if the factum of a deed of charge by a manager for an infant be established, and the fact of the advance be proved, the presumption of law is prima facie to support the charge, and the onus of disproving it rests on the heir, though professing to be a general one, is not to be so regarded and must be read in connection with the facts of that case (418-9). ———Validity of—Proprietorship of estate—Assumption wrongful by manager of—Alienation in right of.

Under the Hindu Law, the right of a bona fide incumbrancer who has taken from a de facto Manager a charge on lands created honestly, for the purpose of saving the estate, or for the benefit of the estate, is not (provided the circumstances would support the charge had it emanated from a de facto and de jure manager) affected by the want of union of the de facto with the de jure title (412-3).

A mortgage bond to secure a sum of money lent to a party deceased, in substitution of a previous deed executed by a former proprietor, by way of further security for a sum advanced by the mortgagee to the widow of the deceased, charging part of the ancestral estate. described the widow as having a beneficial proprietary right in the mortgaged estates, although, in fact, she was only the manager of her son, a minor, the deceased's heir. from the mortgagee, the court below, holding that the mother had assumed proprietorship of the estate and executed the mortgage only in her capacity as proprietor, declined to go into the question of the binding nature of the charge as against the estate.

APPEAL BY—WITHDRAWAL BY MINOR OF, ON ATTAINING MAJORITY.

———Right of—Opposition to—Guardian's right of—Costs incurred by him on behalf of minor—Remedy in respect of.

A suit brought by a Hindu widow, as Guardian of an infant, the adopted son of her deceased husband, was dismissed by the High Court, and she, as guardian of the infant, preferred an appeal to His Majesty in Council against the decision of the High Court. After the transcript was forwarded to England, and before the appeal was heard, the infant came of age and petitioned the High Court for the withdrawal of the appeal, and the High Court referred the application to the Judicial Committee. On a question arising whether the widow could resist the adopted son's application for the withdrawal of the appeal, held that she could not.

The widow has not such an interest in the appeal or such a locus standi in this court as entitles her to resist the application and to insist that the appeal shall go on, although the party in whose name it is brought wishes to withdraw from it.

If she has incurred costs on behalf of the infant in this suit, she may have a claim to be recouped from his estate, if he has any; but that does not entitle her to prosecute this appeal in his name against his will. If the lady herself, as widow has a better title, that title cannot be litigated in this suit, but must be litigated in an independent suit, in which, rejecting the adoption, she would come forward as the next heir of the deceased (605-6). ———Fraud on minor by transaction creating—Proof of.

Their Lordships are disposed to say that the Courts below were warranted in imputing the character of fraudulent contrivance to this transaction (an ikrar executed by the guardian of the respondent, a minor, charging the respondent's property.)

The negotiation out of which it sprang was one between a Purdah woman acting as the guardian and manager of an infant's estate, and a keen man of business, at that time a debtor to the estate. She is induced to sign an instrument which transforms the debtor into a creditor, and heavily burdens her ward's property without consideration, except the merely colourable one of the abandonment of the appeal, and the promise of future advances for the purposes of litigation, of which a portion at least, was neither necessary nor prudent; of litigation which, if unsuccessful, would be ruinous to the estate, and, if successful, was to result in a division of spoils absolutely in compatible with her duty as guardian. It is not shown that, in coming to this agreement, she had the assistance of proper or independent advisers. On the other hand, it is not shown affirmatively by what practice (if any) upon her ignorance or her fears she may have been induced to execute the document. She may or may not have been fully informed as to what she was doing. But whether she was herself defrauded, or whether she acted in collusion with the appellant, the transaction was in either case a fraud upon the respondent (471-2) (Sir James W. Colvile.) LALLA BUNSEEDHUR v. KOONWAR BINDESEREE DUTT SINGH. (1866) 10 M. I. A. 454 = 2 Suth. 39 = 2 Sar. 167.

———Fraudulent transaction—Setting aside of transaction as being a—Money advanced under it for binding purposes—Chargee's right to.

An ikrarnamah executed by the guardian of the respondent, during his minority, charging the minor's estate in favour of the appellant, and an execution purchase of that property by the appellant in a suit brought by him on foot of that ikrarnamah were set aside as being prejudicial to the interests of the respondent. The decree in the suit brought by the appellant to enforce the ikrar was for Rs. 70,000 odd, and the purchase in execution was for Rs. 51,000 odd. It was found that, out of the sum for which the ikrar was executed, a sum of Rs. 27,000 had been advanced by the appellant for purposes binding on the estate of the respondent, and that the appellant was entitled to the said amount with interest at the rate provided by the ikrar. The courts below decreed possession of the property in question to the respondent with mesne profits, and allowed the appellant to set off against the amount to the respondent for mesne profits the said sum of Rs. 27,000 with interest at the contract rate.

On appeal to their Lordships it was contended for the appellant that the execution was good, at least, to the extent of the Rs. 27,000 advanced for binding purposes; and that the rights of the respondent against the appellant, taking them at their highest, were limited to the recovery of the difference between that sum and the price bid at the execution sale.

Held that, if the respondent had been wronged by the sale of his property at the suit of the appellant, the relief suggested fell very far short of an adequate remedy for that wrong, that to restore the property to the respondent on the terms of paying to the appellant what might be justly due to him was far more equitable than the proposed limitation of his remedy to the surplus proceeds of the sale, and that the decree-holder being himself the purchaser the execution sale was no effectual bar to the application of the more appropriate equity (473-4).

The property of which the respondent has been deprived was ancestral; and the feeling on the subject of ancestral property is so strong in these Provinces, that the policy of allowing it to be taken in execution and sold under judicial sales has been seriously questioned. And even if no account is to be taken of that feeling, it is notorious that landed property when sold under an execution, rarely, if ever realises its full value (473). (Sir James W. Colvile.) LALLA BUNSEEDHUR v. KOONWUR BINDESEREE DUTT SINGH.

———Fraudulent transaction—Setting aside of transaction as being a, on payment to chargee of portion of money advanced by him for binding purposes — Interest on that amount—Rate of, to be allowed—Contract rate or not

An ikrarnama executed by the guardian of the respondent, during his minority, charging the minor's estate in favour of the appellant, and an execution purchase of that property by the appellant in a suit brought by him on foot of that ikrarnama were set aside as being fraudulent transactions intended to deprive the respondent of his estate. A portion of the amount for which the ikrar was executed was, however, found to have been advanced by the appellant for purposes binding on the respondents' estate, having been advanced by the appellant to satisfy a judgment debt binding upon the minor's estate. The appellant was, therefore, held entitled to the payment of the said sum by the respondent, and the question arose as to the rate of interest to be allowed on it.

The rate provided for by the ikrar was 6 per cent. The Court below allowed only 5 per cent. It was contended for the respondent that it was a favour to the appellant, in the circumstances, to give him any interest at all on that sum; that the rate was in the discretion of the court below; and that their Lordships should not interfere with that discretion. On behalf of the appellant, it was argued that the rate ought to be 12 per cent., such being the current rate of interest, and that which the judgment debt paid off with the amount would naturally have carried.

Held, that the Court below was right in allowing interest to the appellant, that the rate should be fixed according to some principle, not according to the arbitrary discretion of the judge, and that the appellant was entitled to the contract rate (475).

It may be true that the appellant would not have advanced his money on terms so favourable to the estate if he had not had in view the corrupt advantages for which he had stipulated in the ikrar. But there is no reason why the court, because it will not let him reap the benefit of those improper stipulations, should make a new contract for him in respect of this particular advance (475). The deceased father of the respondent was the manager of a business carried on first by the deceased father of the appellant, and then in the names of the appellant's mother and the appellant. The respondent's father died having adopted the respondent, a minor, and having appointed by will two persons as his guardians. The said two peesons obtained a certificate under Act No.20 of 1841. Thereafter, the appellant's mother instituted a suit against the said guardians to recover from the estate of the respondent's father a sum alleged to have been misappropriated by him. That suit was settled by a deed of compromise, whereby it was agreed that Rs. 74,000 should be paid by the defendants, in instalments, and a decree was passed on foot of the compromise.

The respondent, after attaining age, commenced the suit out of which the appeal arose to set aside that compromise decree as fraudulent and collusive, and to recover the amount paid under that decree from the appellant. The courts below held that the burden of proving the debt lay upon the appellant.

Held, that the burden of proving his allegations that the suit was fictitious and the compromise fraudulent and collusive lay upon the plaintiff-respondent ; and an element in that proof, without which his case amounted to nothing, was the non-existence of a debt ; and that it rested, therefore, with him to give, at all events, prima facie evidence of that before the burden of proof was shifted to the appellant (399). ———Rent of minor's taluk—Compromise permanently settling—Binding character of.

In a suit for enhancement of the rent of a talook which was instituted in July, 1882, the defence was that a deed of compromise was executed in August, 1825, by virtue of which the defendants alleged that the rent of the talook was permanently settled. That deed was executed by one B, who was the widow of J, to whom the property had belonged, and who had adopted, before the execution of the deed, N, the grandfather of the plaintiff.

The circumstances under which that deed of compromise was executed were these. Sometime before March, 1823, a suit was brought by B and K, the owner of the other four annas of the zemindari, for enhancement of the rent of the talook ; and the defence set up to that suit by the ancestors of the defendants was that the mouzahs had been granted to them in permanent mokurruri, and that the rent was not liable to be enhanced. The suit was brought in the Zillah Court, and a decree was made in favour of the plaintiffs, deciding that the rent was liable to be enhanced, and that if the defendants did not pay the rent demanded, the mouzahs in dispute should be measured according to the hustbood jarib stated by the plaintiffs, and the jumma be assessed thereon. An appeal from that decree to the civil Appellate Court was dismissed on 11th May, 1824. In that state of things the deed of compromise was made in August, 1825. It was addressed to M, the ancestor of the defendants, and was executed by B ; it stated that the defendants were paying the annual istimrari rent of Rs. 399 odd, with progressive increase added, that, in appeal to the Court of the Zillah and the provincial Court, a decree was passed for measurement and ascertainment of gross rents, and that for amicably settling with the defendants for an increase in the rent, the rent was fixed at sicca Rs. 600, including the old rent The balance payable by the defendants, after certain named deductions on account of their share, was fixed in perpetuity. The defendants also presented a petition to the Court, saying that they assented to that compromise.

Nothing more appeared to have taken place, except that the rent was regularly paid according to the compromise, until about 1854, and then a suit was again brought for enhancement of rent. That passed through various stages of appeal until it reached the Sudder Court. That Court found that B. acted as guardian for N, when she signed that deed of compromise, and that from the date of the compromise up to the period of N attaining his majority, the rent was collected according to the deed of compromise, and after that time until the institution of that suit in 1853. The Sudder Court therefore held that N was bound by the act of his mother done in 1832, as his guardian, and acquiesced in by him since he reached his majority.

Held, that the deed of compromise was a binding one, and that therefore the suit for the enhancement of rent ought to be dismissed (69).

The circumstances existing at the time of the compromise must be considered. The parties were litigating not merely as to whether the rent was of the proper amount, or ought to be enhanced, but the defendants were contending that they had a perpetual tenure at a then fixed rent, and this was a settlement which was to put an end to the litigation, and which would also prevent the expense, and delay, and the uncertainty of the result, which was dependent upon the investigation that the Court had ordered to decide what the amount of rent, if it were to be enhanced, should be. Apparently it is a compromise which it cannot be said would not be beneficial to the infant, the adopted son (N), but is one which might fairly and naturally be come to as putting an end to the litigation and deciding once for all the matter which was in dispute between the parties ; because it must not be forgotten that although there had been a decree affirmed on appeal that the rent was liable to be enhanced, that was subject to a further appeal, and the case might have been carried further by the defendant if this compromise had not been entered into (67). By selling the land as rent free, the guardian sold less land than she could have sold if it had been valued as subject to rent. The appellant was a banker. She had made very large payments for the respondents, during the time that they, or some of them, were minors, in respect of revenue due to the Government from a zemindary belonging to them. Those advances were made at the instance of a person who was the guardian of the infants, and executor and trustee under the will of their father. For those sums the respondents on taking possession of their zemindary had given a kistbundy, or engagement, to pay the amount by instalments, and the suit by the appellant was for one of the instalments so secured.

There appeared to be great reason to suspect fraud on the part of the guardian, and some reason to believe that the agents of the appellant were privy to it. It was very possible that if the respondents had instituted a suit to take the accounts of the guardian, and, challenging collusion between him and the appellant, had investigated the transactions which had taken place between the guardian and the appellant, it might have appeared that there was no such sum as was claimed by the appellant justly due to her. But as the guardian was their spiritual guide the respondents elected not to challenge the transactions and thus expose him to a suit, and thought better to come to terms with the appellant, to obtain time for payment of the debt by instalments. The kistbundy was accordingly executed, and the respondents were advised by a person who was their confidential agent that the arrangement was beneficial to them.

Held, that under the circumstances, the objection that no adjustment of accounts had taken place to ascertain the balance really due to the appellant before the kistbundy was granted could not be allowed to prevail ; and that the respondents could not be permitted, after the death of the guardian, to dispute their liability for payment of the debt which they had deliberately undertaken to pay. A suit by the plaintiffs' guardians for the plaintiffs' mother's share in certain dower resulted in a decree for Rs. 62,913 calculated on the allegation in the plaint that such share was one-third of the entire amount of dower. That decree having been sold by the guardians for the alleged sum of Rs. 51,000, the plaintiffs brought the present suit to set aside that sale as collusive.

Held, that it was incumbent on the defendants in this suit to prove that they paid the rupees to the plaintiffs when they came of age, or at least that the money reached the plaintiffs' hand when they came of age.

A compromise set up by the defendants in the present suit having been rejected, a decree was given to the plaintiffs for the sum of Rs. 62,913 awarded in the original suit. The decree was upheld in appeal ; but as it was alleged that on the facts stated in the plaint in the original suit the ———Estate not purporting to be dealt with or affected by guardian—Lease for minor's benefit.

LEASE TAKEN BY—RENT DUE UNDER — LIABILITY OF MINOR'S ESTATE FOR.

The respondent was the adopted son of one G, deceased. During the minority of the respondent the mother and widow of G took a fresh lease of property which G had during his lifetime held under a lease. The lessees therein described themselves respectively as "mother of the late G" and "mother of the minor adopted son" and they bound themselves to pay the rents reserved. and to pay interest on any arrears. A few months before the respondent attained age, the widow of G surrendered the lands to the plaintiffs, the lessors. The mother of G had died previously.

In a suit brought to recover arrears of rent due under the said lease. the estate of G was sought to be made liable for the said arrears on the ground that, under the terms of G's will, his mother and widow had power to bind his estate, and had done so by the fresh lease in question, and that the respondent, having succeeded to that estate was bound by the act of his adopted mother and grandmother as his guardians, done in the bona fide belief that it was beneficial to the estate. The Sub-judge, while admitting that there was nothing in the lease to show that it was taken for the benefit of the respondent, held that the estate was liable because it was proved that the lease was really taken for the respondent's benefit, and the lessees were in possession for the respondent's benefit. The Sub-judge relied upon the case of Hunooman Persaud Panday.

Held, dissenting from the Sub-judge, that the respondent's estate was not liable (93).

The present case is distinguishable from that of Hunooman Persaud Panday. In the present case the mother and widow of G were not dealing with, and did not purport to deal with or affect, his estate, but were incurring new obligations which it is now sought to transfer from them to the estate. It may be that, as between them and the infant, they might be able, in some circumstances, to show that the estate ought to bear the burden they had taken upon themselves, but that is not the question raised in this case, in which the plaintiffs seek to establish a direct relation between themselves and the estate of the infant, and a liability on the part of the infant now that he is of age, and of his estate, to fulfil the obligations entered into by the lessees in their own name (93-4). In a suit to enforce against the defendant a mortgage bond executed by her guardian during her minority, one of the issues raised was whether the guardian really executed the suit bond, and whether the defendant was bound to pay off the debt.

Held, that the portion of the issue whether the guardian really executed the suit bond put into issue the execution of the bond, while the other portion whether the defendant was bound to pay off the debt put in issue the validity of the bond, not only on account of non-execution by the guardian, but its validity generally as against the defendant and therefore suggested the question whether the defendant was bound by the acts of her guardian (50-1). In a suit to enforce against the defendant a mortgage bond executed by her guardian during her minority, one of the issues raised was whether the guardian really executed the suit bond, and whether the defendant was bound to pay off the debt. On appeal to the High Court, the defendant raised the ground, amongst others, that she was in no way bound by the acts or statements of her guardian unless it was proved that those acts were done under necessity and for the benefit of the estate. On that ground of appeal, the High Court considered the question of necessity for the rate of interest provided for by the suit bond, and decided in favour of the defendant.

Held that, though the defence did not clearly draw the distinction between the principal and the interest of the suit bond, yet as the decision of the High Court was right on the merits and there was no suggestion even of any injustice being done to the plaintiff (appellant) by the want of particularity in the defendant's written statement and by her not having drawn a proper distinction between the principal due on the bond and the interest, the decision of the High Court would not be interfered with (50-1.) ———Power of—Validity—Creditor's duty—Antecedent mismanagement—Creditor's responsibility for—Application of money—Creditor's duty to see to.

The power of the Manager for an infant heir to charge an estate not his own is, under the Hindu law, a limited and qualified power. It can only be exercised rightly in case of need, or for the benefit of the estate. But where, in the particular instance, the charge is one that a prudent owner would make, in order to benefit the estate, the bona fide lender is not affected by the precedent mismanagement of the estate. The actual pressure on the estate, the danger to be averted, or the benefit to be conferred upon it, in the particular instance, is the thing to be regarded. But, of course, if that danger arises or has arisen from any misconduct to which the lender is or has been a party, he cannot take advantage of his own wrong, to support a charge in his own favour against the heir, grounded on a necessity which his wrong has helped to cause. Therefore, the lender unless he is shown to have acted mala fide, will not be affected, though it be shown that, with better management the estate might have been kept free from debt. Their Lordships think that the lender is bound to inquire into the necessities for the loan, and to satisfy himself as well as he can with reference to the parties with whom he is dealing, that the Manager is acting in the particular instance for the benefit of the estate. But they think that if he does so inquire, and acts honestly, the real existence of an alleged sufficient and reasonably-credited necessity is not a condition precedent to the validity of his charge, and they do not think that, under such circumstances, he is bound to see to the application of the money. The suit was to set aside a mortgage bond executed by the plaintiff's mother, one of the defendants in the suit, in favour of the appellant, the other defendant, in respect of plaintiff's estate, and to recover possession of the property comprised in the bond. The bond was executed during the plaintiff's minority, his mother being his then natural guardian.

The appellate Court decreed the suit on the sole ground that the bond was executed by the mother in her proprietary character, and not as guardian for the plaintiff, that the appellant insisted at the trial and in the appeal that she was the proprietor of the estate mortgaged, and that, as the estate really belonged to the plaintiff, she had no title to it, and that the mortgage bond executed by her as proprietor could not affect the plaintiff's estate. The appellate Court thought that that was the only question to be tried in the suit, and it declined to enter into the question whether the charge created by the bond bound the property in the hands of the plaintiff.

There is not in Indian law any rule which gives a guardian and manager greater power to bind the infant ward by a personal covenant than exists in English law. In point of fact, the matter must be decided by equity and good conscience, generally interpreted to mean the rules of English law if found applicable to Indian society and circumstances. Their Lordships are not aware of any law in which the guardian has such a power, nor do they see why it should be so in India. In a suit brought by the plaintiffs respondents to have it declared that a deed of sale executed by their father, one of the defendants in the suit, in favour of the others, was invalid, and for possession of one-anna share in talook wari, which was the subject of that deed, the purchasers contended that the plaintiffs were not entitled to a decree for the one-anna share claimed, inter alia, on the ground that, even assuming that the plaintiff's father had no right to sell their interest, his own interest in talook wari equalled, or exceeded, that which he had professed to sell, and that the plaintiffs had no title to what they claimed.

The Sub-Judge upheld that contention, but the High Court overruled it being of opinion that the evidence of the plaintiffs, and especially the language of the deed of sale in question proved that the father had relinquished his interest in the said property, which had belonged to his deceased wife and the mother of the plaintiff.

In March 1910, a Hindu father affected to appoint appellant to be guardian of the persons of his two infant sons and authorised her to act as such from that time forward. The appellant thereupon took charge of the boys and defrayed the expenses of their maintenance and education. In February, 1912, they left India in the company of the appellant and were finally left by her in England, with arrangements for their entering the University of Oxford. In July 1912, the father (respondent) purported to cancel the appointment of the appellant guardian of his sons, and demanded back their custody. He instituted a suit in the District Court of Chingleput for a declaration that he, and not the appellant, was entitled to the charge and guardianship of his sons, and for an order on the appellant to hand over such sons to him (the respondent). The infants were respectively 17 and 14 at the date of the suit and were resident in England. The High Court, to which the suit was transferred under clause 13 of the Letters Patent, declared that the respondent was guardian of the persons of his infant sons and ordered the appellant to hand over the custody of the infants to the respondent as such guardian.

Held, that the order of the High Court directing the appellant to take the infants back to India could not be lawfully carried out without their consent or without an order from the Court exercising the jurisdiction of the Crown over infants in England, and that the order of the High Court ought not therefore to be allowed to stand (324).

The real questions were whether the respondent was still entitled to exercise the functions of guardian and resume the custody of his sons and alter the scheme which had been formulated for their education, and whether in the events which had happened the respondent was at liberty to revoke the authority given by him to the appellant in March, 1910. Both questions fell to be determined having regard to the interests and welfare of the infants, bearing in mind of course, their parentage and religion, and could only be decided by a Court exercising the jurisdiction of the Crown over infants, and in their presence. The infants should have been properly represented, and their wishes ascertained. (Lord Parker). BESANT v, NARAYANIAH. (1914) 41 I. A. 314 = 38 M. 807 = 16 M. L. T. 165 = (1914) M. W. ———Mother's right of custody and of—Conversion of mother to Mahomedanism and re-marriage in Mahomedan form—Effect.

The question was as to the correctness of an order of the High Court removing an infant ward and her property from the custody and guardianship of her mother, the appellant, and the alleged second husband of that mother.

Beyond all questions the ward was the child of a Christian father, the issue of a Christian marriage. She was left an infant of very tender years, her father being massacred at Delhi in the year 1857. She remained thenceforth under the protection of her mother (appellant), a lady, apparently, of ancestry not Christian, and with no great knowledge of

Minor—Guardianship of—(Contd.)

Christian tenets, or attachment to Christian habits. But she was married to a Christian in a Christian church, and did not appear to have professed any other faith, or to have reverted in costume or customs to her ancestral faith until 1867. The child up to that time had certainly been brought up and, so far as she was educated at all, educated as a Christian girl eating, drinking, and associating with her Christian cousins, and going to a school.

In 1867 this occurred. J with whom she had been living and cohabiting as husband and wife desired to marry her. He was however, a Christian, and was already the husband in Christian marriage of a living Christian wife. This device was, therefore, resorted to. The appellant became a Mahomedan, J became a Mahomedan, and he contracted in Mahomedan form a Mahomedan marriage with the appellant.

After the alleged second marriage of the appellant, some relatives interfered, in order that the child might be sent to a proper school—a proper Christian school ; and J and the appellant, professing to yield to the suggestion, took the girl in June. 1869, up to Simla, with the avowed object of placing her in a Christian school there. The appellant alleged that that project failed, by reason of the girl's refusal to go to school ; and that she began to express a preference for the Mahomedan religion, and the Oriental mode of feminine life in seclusion behind the purdah ; and that at some period (the time was not exactly fixed) a Moulvie was introduced, who coufirmed her in her resolution to become a Mahomedan.

On an application by the relatives of the girl. the courts in India made an order, under the provisions of the Acts Nos. XL of 1858 and IX of 1861, removing the infant from the custody of the appellant, and placing her under a Christian guardian.

Held, that the order was right (328).

When the connection between J and the appellant was formed, whether it was merely adulterous or under the cover of a Mahomedan marriage the home was no longer a fit home for a Christian young girl ; and if the matter had then been brought to the notice of the Judge, it would have been his plain duty, without delay, to find a more suitable home and guardianship than what had become, in fact, the home and guardianship of J (325). The suit was for the recovery of arrears of rent personally from the respondent and from his adoptive mother. The arrears were due in respect of a lease taken, during the minority of the respondent, by his said adoptive mother and by his grandmother. The grandmother having died previously, the adoptive mother had, before the respondent attained majority, surrendered possession to the lessors (plaintiffs); but there were arrears of rent due under the lease in respect of which the suit was brought.

The suit as brought was to make the respondent and his adoptive mother personally liable for the said arrears. The Courts below held, and their lordships agreed, that neither the respondent nor his adoptive mother was personally liable for the said arrears. Before their Lordships the plaintiffs suggested that, under the terms of the will of the respondent's adoptive father, his mother and widow had power to bind his estate, and had done so, and that the respondent, having succeeded to that estate, was bound by the act of his adoptive mother and grandmother as his guardians, done in the bona fide belief that it was beneficial to his estate. But neither in the plaint nor in the issues was any claim made against the estate of the adoptive father. And there was enough in the evidence to show that if the claim made by the suit was treated as one against the estate and against the heir, to the extent of the assets received by him, it would raise entirely new issues, both as to the extent of assets received and as to the extent to which the plaintiffs themselves were responsible for the renewal of the lease; that it would, in fact, be a new suit, and that it would be improper to allow such a change of case at that period of the litigation.

Held that, under the circumstances, the new ground of liability suggested by the plaintiffs could not be allowed to be raised (93). (Lord Hannen.) INDUR CHUNDER SINGH v. RADHAKISHORE GHOSE. (1892) 19 I.A. 90 = 19 C. 507 (511-2) = 6 Sar. 185.

———Appointment of public officer for—Jurisdiction of Supreme Court of Madras as to—Order appointing such officer under general jurisdiction of court to regulate its practice—Validity.

Acting under the general jurisdiction of the Court to regulate its practice and not under the powers given by the Statute of the 2nd & 3rd Vict., C. 34, the Supreme Court of Madras made on its equity side a general order that "whenever it shall appear that the property of any infant is unprotected, and not secured for his or her benefit, the Registrar shall, with the previous consent of the Court or a Judge, institute proceedings on behalf of such infant, for the purpose of protecting his or her person or property." The order was not transmitted to England, and had never been submitted to the Governor in Council.

Held that the Supreme Court had no authority to make such an order.

If it was considered by the Court that it was advisable to appoint a public officer to institute suits on behalf of infants, and that it had authority to make it, it should have been done under the provisions of the Statute of Victoria, in which case the Regulation would have been subject to be altered or rescinded by Her Majesty in Council (345). By a general order of the Supreme Court of Madras, the Registrar of that Court was directed to institute proceedings with the previous consent of the court, in all cases where the property of infants should appear to be unprotected. With a view to obtain that consent, the Registrar of that Court presented a petition to it for leave to institute a suit in Chancery against the appellant on behalf of the infant children of the appellant. Notice of the application was given to the appellant to show cause against it. She appeared of her own accord, without any process being issued to compel appearence, and without any order being sought to be made upon her, and objected to the grant of the leave prayed for. Her objections were, however, overruled, and leave was granted.

On objection taken to the validity of the order on the ground that it was made upon petition without the existence of any suit to found the jurisdiction of the court, held that the presentation of the petition was the only proper mode of making the application, and that no question of jurisdiction

Mother.

INHERITANCE TO SON—RIGHT OF.

———Conveyance of, or contract to convey—Suit brought on behalf of son (minor at the time) by another person as guardian—Petition by mother in, admitting that guardian's right to sue and stating that she had no interest in property in suit—Effect of.

A suit to redeem a mortgage made by a deceased Hindu was brought in the name of S, his infant son, represented by the appellant as his adoptive mother and guardian. The defendants-mortgagees resisted the suit on the ground that the respondent, the natural mother of S, and not the appellant, was his proper guardian, and was the person entitled to bring the suit. On that occasion the respondent presented a petition stating that the appellant was every way proprietor in her own right and as guardian of her adopted son, S, and that she (respondent) herself had no interest in the property. The attempted adoption of S by the appellant was invalid, and therefore the respondent became entitled, on the death of S, to his property as mother and heiress, and she sued the appellant for the recovery of the same. The appellant resisted the suit on the ground that, by virtue of the respondent having filed the aforementioned petition in the mortgage suit, she was precluded from claiming and recovering the property as mother and heiress of S.

Held, that the petition operated neither as a conveyance nor as a contract to convey the subsequently acquired interests of the respondent, and was no bar to the enforcement of her right (599).

At the time when the respondent presented this petition she had not in fact any interest in the property at all, and certainly had not become entitled to any interest as the heir of her son, who was at that time alive. Further, there is not the least reason to suppose that in the petition she in any degree contemplated a conveyance of any such right. That was not the right which they were then considering at all. The main object of the petition was simply to enable the redemption suit to go on. There was nothing in the language and nothing in the position of the parties which could lead any one to suppose that she had any interest that she might hereafter acquire as heir of her son, in her contemplation at all (598-9). It was purchased by the appellant with money borrowed by him solely upon his personal security in execution of a decree obtained against a third party. The estates of the asthal were not charged as security for the money borrowed by the appellant, and there was no sufficient evidence to prove that the money paid for the purchase was the money of the Asthal.

Held, on the evidence, that the appellant was entitled to the property in question (144-5.) (Sir Barnes Peacock.) MUNGUL DAS v. MOHUNT BAWUN DAS. (1877) Bald. 140 = 1 I. J. 706.

debts, and, if the Asthal was not liable for such debts, his successor would be clearly entitled to have the sale set aside. These considerations apply a fortiori to transactions in relation to the Asthal property of a person who derives his authority from the de jure head of the institution.

J, the Mahant of an Asthal, appointed plaintiff, a minor, his successor, and left a will whereby he appointed C, his guardian. J had mortgaged the Asthal property. After his death, the mortgagees brought or threatened proceedings on the mortgages. To pay off these liabilities C obtained the sanction of the District Judge to sell a portion of the Asthal properties, and, in pursuance of such sanction, executed a deed of sale in favour of the defendants. In a suit by plaintiff to have the sale set aside on the ground that there was no valid necessity for the alienation, and that the debts of J were not binding on the property of the asthal, it was contended that the mortgages for the discharge of which the sale sought to be impugned was effected, were executed by J for the satisfaction of some older debts. There was, however, no evidence that the defendants (alienees) made any enquiry as to the character of those debts, whether they were incurred for the benefit of the Asthal, or for the benefit of J, in his capacity as Mahant, and there was nothing to show that any portion of the monies borrowed in the first instance went for purposes which would make them binding on the Asthal.

Held, that C, whether acting as executor to the will of J or as guardian of plaintiff, had no larger powers of alienation than the de jure head of the institution, and that, as the defendants had wholly failed to establish any justifying necessity for the sale by C, the same was rightly set aside. An ordinary birt, or charitable and religious grant, made by a pious Hindu Rajah to a Hindu gossain, contained, inter alia, the following words:—"Mouzah, with boundaries, you will, at ease of mind, make cultivation and settlement of, and, making distribution out of the proceeds that arise among sadhus and saints (holy and religious men) you with your disciples and companions will enjoy (the remainder) without any anxiety. Knowing this to be a grant made for the love of the deity named above, no one will offer any opposition." The grant was subsequently confirmed in 1786 by one of the successors of the original grantor.

By that time an Asthal had sprung up, and the guru or preceptor had become the head of an institution with a seat of honour (the gaddi). The Asthal was thenceforth an institution devoted to the cult of the worshippers who congregated there.

Held, that the property, though granted to an individual, was burdened with an explicit and unambiguous trust, that set out in the grant, and that all acquisitions with the income thereof were subject to the same trust (9-10.) The appeal arose out of a suit brought against the appellant by G, as the mohunt of an Asthal, to recover possession of parcels of property described in the schedule to the plaint.

The parcels in question were the property of the Asthal, but were seised in execution under a decree which one P had obtained against the former mohunt. They were sold in execution for the sum of Rs. 5,849, and purchased by the appellant with money which he had borrowed from one L. The appellant was at that time manager of the Asthal under the former mohunt, and he borrowed the purchase money from L upon the mortgage, amongst other property, of three items of property belonging to the Asthal.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to the parcels so purchased by the appellant (146.)

The appellant, being a trustee, raised moneys upon the estates of his cestui qui trusts, and with that money bought the parcels in question. Under these circumstances the plaintiff is entitled to the parcels in question (146).

Held further that in case the appellant paid off the mortgage to L and obtained a release of the parcels belonging to the Asthal mortgaged by him to L from the charge created thereby, he would be entitled to take credit in account with the plaintiff for the sum of Rs. 5,849 borrowed by him for making the purchase in question (147). The deed which was put in evidence was dated 15—8—1860, and purported to be a conveyance of the property to the appellant in consideration of the payment of Rs. 8,000.

Held, on the evidence, affirming the High Court, that the property was not bona fide conveyed to the appellant for his own use, but that it was a mere pretended sale to protect it from creditors (143). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) MUNGUL DAS v. MOHUNT BAWAN DAS. (1877) Bald. 140 = 1 I. J. 706.

ORIGIN, NATURE AND CONSTITUTION OF.

———Mohunt of—Position and powers of.

An Asthal, commonly known in Northern India as a Math, is an institution of a monastic nature. It is established for the service of a particular cult, the instruction in its tenets, and the observance of its rites. The followers of the cult and disciples in the institution are known as chelas; the chelas are of two classes—celibate and non-celibate. The mahant is the head of the institution. He sits upon the gaddi; he initiates candidates into the mysteries of the cult; he superintends the worship of the idol and the accustomed spiritual rites; he manages the property of the institution; he administers its affairs; and the whole assets are vested in him as the owner thereof in trust for the institution itself. Upon his death or abdication he is succeeded by one of the bairagi chelas. These bairagi chelas are, as stated, celibates; or if they have ever been married they must, prior to their initiation as bairagi chelas, have renounced their wives and families and have conformed to the practice of the Math. This practice is ascetic; it involves a separation from all worldly wealth and ties, and a self-dedication to the services and rites of the Asthal. Pious persons endow the schools with property, which is vested in the preceptor for the time being, and a home for the school is erected and a Mattam constituted (75-6). The mahant is not only a spiritual preceptor, but also a trustee in respect of the Asthal over which he presides (90). (Lord Shaw). RAM PARKASH DAS v. ANAND DAS. (1916) 43 I. shebaits of the whole of the moveable and immoveable property dedicated to Annapoorna Thakooranee aforesaid. They will carry out the supervision and the improvement of the said property. But they will do everything according to the advice of all the principal officers appointed by me. They will not be competent to make gift or sale of the different properties. Up to the time that the said two adopted sons do not attain their majority, my aforesaid two wives will exercise the care and control of all the said properties, and in carrying out these duties they shall take the advice of all the principal officers which have been appointed by me. They will not be competent to act otherwise. When the two adopted sons shall have attained their majority, and shall have acquired sufficient knowledge for the preservation of the property, my two wives shall make over to them as shebaits, to their satisfaction, all the property dedicated to the Issur Deb Sheba. Out of the income of the property dedicated to the Deb Sheba, etc., after performing the sheba of the abovementioned Annapoorna Thakooranee, and the Sree Sree Issurs established by my ancestors and myself, and after meeting the prescribed monthly allowances, and after performing the daily and fixed rites and ceremonies, as they are now performed and met, out of the profits which shall remain, each adopted son shall receive at the rate of 1,000 rupees monthly."

Held that, on the true construction of the will, the property thereby given to the Thakoor therein mentioned was given for the purpose of securing the proper performance of the Sheba of the said Thakoor and the other family Thakoors in the will mentioned, and the prescribed monthly allowances, and the proper performance of the daily and fixed rites and ceremonies as they were performed and met in the testator's lifetime (133).

Held further, that the other dispositions of the will were inoperative, and that on the testator's death his two widows were his heirs-at-law, and as such became shebaits of the Thakoor, and entitled for the widows' estate to such interest in the testator's property as remained undisposed of by the will (133).

It is argued that by the will all is given to the Thakoor, the heirs become shebaits, and manage the property in the usual way. But the matter is not quite so simple.

After all the charges prescribed by the will were met there would be a very large surplus, and the testator must have been well aware of that. In fact he directs that out of the surplus each adopted son shall receive Rs. 1,000 monthly; but of the residue after that he says nothing. There is no indication that the testator intended any extension of the worship of the family Thakoors. He merely prescribes that his family worship shall be conducted in the accustomed way, by giving his property to one of the Thakoors. But the effect of that, when the estate is large, is to leave some beneficial interest undisposed of, and that interest must be subject to the legal incidents of property. After performing their prescribed duties as shebaits, the widows of the testator became entitled to the beneficial interest in the surplus for the widow's estate (127-8). ABSOLUTE DEDICATION TO IDOL SUBJECT TO CHARGE IN FAVOUR OF HEIRS—GIFT TO HEIRS SUBJECT TO CHARGE IN FAVOUR OF IDOL.

———Test.

The question is whether, according to the true intent of the will, the idol for whom the property is granted was intended to take absolutely. A reference to the second, third, and fifth clauses of the will lead us to the conclusion, that although the will purports to begin with an absolute gift in favour of the idol, it is plain that the testator contemplated that there was to be some distribution of the property according as events might turn out; and that he did not intend to give this property absolutely to the idol seems to be clear from the directions which are contained in the third clause that after the expenses of the idol are paid, the surplus shall be accumulated; and still more so from the fifth clause, by which the testator has provided for whatever surplus shall remain out of the interest of the property, the expenses of the idol being first deducted. It is plain that the testator, looking at the expenses of the idol, was not contemplating an absolute and entire gift in favour of the idol (85-6). You have the power to appoint a shebait for the worship of the gods."

Held, on a construction of the deed, that the intention of the donor was to perpetuate the worship in the family, and not to make an absolute gift of the property to the donee, subject to her making due provision for the worship of the idols (664).

The power to appoint a shebait is consistent with either construction. The words "from generation to generation," may, in some cases, mean no more than to express the absolute character of the gift; but, considering the subject-matter, it seems more probable that in this deed they were used in their natural sense to denote an intention to perpetuate the worship in the family (664). Held, that on the right construction of the will, its effect was to charge the property in the hands of the executors thereby appointed with the payment of such sums as might be necessary to defray the expenses which might from time to time be incurred in the daily worship of the idol therein mentioned, in the manner in which such service was performed at the time of the death of the testatrix, and with the expenses of the parbans and of the poojas and other religious acts and ceremonies in the said will mentioned ; and that the surplus left, after defraying such expenses, belonged to the members of the joint family, of whom *D. 'You' shall be the person in charge of the Sheba of all the deities." There was then introduced a separate and definite gift with regard to two houses, out of which was directed there should be performed the Sheba of Sri Sri Iswarjew "as it is at present," and that the remainder of the income should be divided between the other members of the surviving branches of her own family, except her second son, who was insane. The testatrix then referred again to the balance of the interest accruing from the Company's paper, and directed how that was to be dealt with in connection with religious services. COLORABLE DEDICATION.

———Bona fide and real dedication—Evidence.

The question was whether certain Government papers for a sum of two lakhs and Rs. 15,000 had been, by an agreement of the members of a joint family then in existence in 1859, devoted to the service of an idol, and, therefore, the plaintiff, the widow of one of the members of the family, could not recover a share of that property, which she sued for, not in her capacity of Shebait, but as part of her husbands' estate. The plaintiff contended that the supposed agreement of dedication, even if actually executed, was colorable and collusive, that it was not intended to have effect, and was merely entered into for the purpose of defeating the possible rights of the widows, and keeping the property in the hands of the male members of the family.

The Sub-Judge held that the agreement had been duly executed, and was a bona fide agreement dedicating the property to the idol. On appeal the High Court treated the agreement of appropriation as invalid, observing that the real aspect of the transaction appeared to be that the parties, not wishing at that time to divide the whole of the Government notes amongst them, or possibly, in order to prevent a widow from taking any part of it, and to preserve it for the male members of the family, resorted to the contrivance to keep a portion as a joint fund to accumulate, and be afterwards used or divided as they might have occasion.

The document was conclusively established, at all events, as far as its execution was concerned, about which there never was any serious dispute It was substantiated by very strong evidence. It was shown to have been acted upon by all the parties.

Held, reversing the High Court, that, under the circumstances, the court would not be justified in putting the agreement aside and declaring it to be a colorable transaction having no validity, merely upon the suggestion—for it amounted to no more—that the amount set aside was an exorbitant amount, and that there might possibly have been some intention to defraud widows or some other persons (131).

———Purchase of property in name of idol—Dealings with property by purchaser on his own account—Effect.

Is there any evidence of an endowment properly so called? What is the evidence of an endowment? This was clearly not an endowment for the benefit of the public. The idol was not set up for the benefit of the public worship. There are no priests appointed, no Brahmins who have any legal interest whatever in the fund. It is not like a temple endowed for the support of Brahmins, for the purpose of performing religious service for the benefit of any Hindoo who might please to go there. It is simply an idol set up by the Maharajah apparently in his own house, and for what purpose? Why, for his own worship. We constantly have suits claiming terms, but here there is no turn or right of worship established. There is nothing stated in any way to show that the Maharajah intended that the idol should be kept up for the benefit of his heirs in perpetuity; and before it can be established that lands have been endowed in perpetuity, so that they can never be sold and must be tied up in perpetuity some clear evidence of an endowment must be given. What are the objects of the endowment? None of the essentials of an endowment are stated. The Maharajah appears to have purchased the property in the name of the idol and that is all. Then he deals with the fund of the idol as if it were his own property. There is no evidence at all of any of the essentials of an endowment in favour of the idol. In the case reported in 5 Suther Dewanny Adawlut Reports 268, it was held that when an endowment is merely nominal, and indications of personal appropriation and exercise of proprietary right are found, a sale of the property is valid under the Hindu law. It appears, therefore, upon the authority of that case, and upon the principle of endowments, that this was not an endowment by the Maharajah in perpetuity for the benefit of the idol, so as to establish that the property so conveyed to the idol was to be the property of the idol for ever and that nobody could alienate it. Here there was no endowment, no priest, no public, no one legally interested in the worship of this idol, except the Maharajah himself, and nothing to show that the Maharajah intended to establish it for the benefit of his sons, or heirs, or anybody else, in perpetuity (871). With regard to private charities, such as, endowments for the support of the family idol, the law is that if there is no contrary provision in the original grant, the right of management passes to the natural heirs of the original grantee, and, if there be no other arrangement or usage and no scheme settled by the court, will be exercised by the managing member of the family before partition, or in turn by the several heirs after partition (7).

The scheme settled by the court on a partition between the heirs will provide for equal rights of management by them and their heirs, either by giving the management to each in rotation, or possibly by dividing the charities and assigning the management of some to one and of the others to the others. This will be the nearest approach that can be made to the ordinary partition which is granted at the request of any one of the coparceners of Hindu family property (7).

———Suit by, for declaration that certain property is debutter—Maintainability—Prior suit between members of family as shebaits for scheme—Decision in, that property was not debutter—No res judicata by reason of.

Suit brought by two family idols represented by a Shebait, a member of a Hindu family, against the appellant and other members of that family, for a declaration that certain property was owned by the idols as debutter. The question for decision was whether the suit was barred under S. 11 of C. P. C. by reason of the decision in a prior suit No. 206 of 1915 to the effect that there was no valid dedication of the property in question to the said idols.

Suit No. 206 of 1915 was instituted by two of the defendants in the subsequent suit against the Shebait representing the idols in the subsequent suit, the appellant, and the other members of the said family. In the plaint in 206 of 1915 both the plaintiffs and the defendants were described as Thakur's Shebaits. The first prayer in the plaint was that all the properties being debutter properties of the Thakur, a Scheme might be framed for the preservation, management and improvement of the said properties, and for the efficient performance of the daily and periodical Shebas of the Thakur and the festivals, etc. There was a further prayer that a manager or trustee should be appointed.

Held that the two gods were not parties to suit No. 206 of 1915 and that the decision therein did not constitute res judicata in the subsequent suit (245).

In the plaint in the prior suit both the plaintiffs and the defendants were described as the Shebaits of the god, so that if the god were regarded as the plaintiff he must also be regarded as the defendant. Further the allegations in the plaint in that suit show that that suit was based upon the assumption that the properties were debutter properties, and that the suit was brought for the purpose of having a scheme framed by the Court for the preservation and management of the properties and for the performance of the daily and periodical shebas. The suit, it was alleged, had become necessary by reason of the disputes as to the management of the properties between the plaintiffs and some of the defendants, all of whom were alleged to be shebaits of the god, and it was apparently not thought necessary to make the two gods, the plaintiffs in the present suit, parties to the 1915 suit. The defendants, strangers to the contract, disputed his right under his assignment to take possession of the jewels, part of the property assigned, and the plaintiff thereupon instituted a suit against them to establish his right to the custody of the said jewels.

Held that, if it was conceded that the assignment had legally transferred all the rights of the urallers to the plaintiff, and that the urallers (assignors) had an unqualified right to the custody of those jewels, it would hardly be an answer to the suit to say that the jewels, being devoted to an idol, were extra commercium (79). A Hindu idol is a "juristic entity". It has a juridicial status with the power of suing and being sued. The plaintiff, as Mohant of the Mutt or Temple of a Hindu Deity at Bhadark, sued, on the 17th July 1901, to recover possession of certain properties situate at Habisarai, alleging that the properties were debuttar property, dedicated to the worship and service of the plaintiff's Thakur, and held by the defendant as an Adhikari in charge of a subordinate Mutt at Bibisarai. A controversy, which arose on the death of a former Mohant, who died leaving two Chelas, as to the right of succession to the two Mutts and the property annexed to them, was settled by an arrangement embodied in an Ekrarnama, dated the 3rd November, 1874, executed by the senior Chela in favour of the junior Chela, described as Adhikari, by which the Mutt at Bhadark, was allotted in perpetuity to the elder Chela and his successors, while the Mutt at Bibisarai and the properties annexed to it, were allotted to the younger Chela and his successors for the purposes connected with his Mutt, subject to a small annual payment towards the expenses of the Bhadrak Mutt. The parties to the suit stood in the place of the elder and younger Chelas respectively :

Held, (affirming the decision of the High Court) that in point of law, the property dealt with by the Ekrarnama was, prior to its date, to be regarded as vested not in the Mohant but in the legal entity, the Idol, the Mohant being only his representative and manager ; that from the date of the Ekrarnama the possession of the junior Chela, by virtue of the terms of that Ekrarnama, was adverse to the right of the Idol and of the senior Chela, as representing that Idol ; and that the suit was barred by limitation. The property of an endowment may consist partly or wholly in the right to enjoy the revenues of property which is in the possession of persons who have the right and the duty to manage the property, collect the revenue and hand it over when collected to be used in the proper manner for the purposes of the endowment. Such persons may even have certain rights of apportionment of the revenue so handed over by them among the several purposes of the endowment.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Religious endowment—Idol—(Contd.)

SHEBAIT OF—(Contd.)

All this is compatible with there being a general trustee of the whole endowment including the revenues when so collected and handed over. But in such a case the general trustee would not be entitled to the possession of the properties out of which this portion of the revenue comes. His rights do not commence until after the collection of the revenue by and under the management of those who hold possession. The general trustee is, after all, only a representative of the idol who is a juridical personage, and who is the true owner, and there is nothing legally incongruous in that personage having other subordinate representatives who have the right to manage certain special portions of his property, and pay over the income so collected to the endowment, and even to some degree to control its use. Such rights would not be inconsistent with the existence of a general trustee, but they would be fatal to his claim to possession of the properties from which these revenues are derived. Possession would be in the hands of those entitled to manage these special properties, and their possession would be adverse to his (197-8). ———General and special trustees—Rights of.

The worship of the Thakoor Dowjee was founded by the plaintiff's grandfather, Dowjee, in the year 1825. The Thakoor was originally placed in a house which had fallen into disrepair. In 1866, M, a devout lady, gave a house and land to Thakoor Dowjee and her own family Thakoor Beharjee, but with the condition attached that, P, the principal defendant, should be shebait. The Thakoors Dowjee and Beharjee were then removed to the house so granted, and in the course of a few years Dowjee's worshippers desired still further to exalt his worship by building a new temple on the site of the house. A large sum of money, about Rs. 16,000, was collected for that purpose; the temple was built, other accommodation being got for the Thakoors in the meantime ; and in the year 1878 they were brought back and installed in the temple.

In a suit brought by the plaintiff, claiming, as the founder's heir, to be the rightful shebait of the Thakoor Dowjee, for possession of the temple in which the idol had been located, held, that the claim to the temple must be governed entirely by the terms of M's dedication, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover possession of the temple from P, the principal defendant (147).

M, gave the house and land to the two Thakoors, but with the condition attached that P should be shebait. The Thakoor Dowjee, or those who speak for him on earth, need not take advantage of this gift. M could not of her own authority alter the shebaitship of the Thakoor. But if the gift is taken and the condition insisted on, it must be observed. It has now been insisted on, and Dowjee must elect whether to change his habitation or to change his shebait (147).

It is true that money was raised to build the temple, and was raised mainly from the worshippers, and in the name of the Thakoor Dowjee. But the facts of this case are not such as to raise an equity of the kind suggested at the Bar. There is no reason to suppose that the subscribers did not know of M's deed ; and there is no evidence that the subscriptions, though given to the Thakoor Dowjee, were given with any reference to the question who should be his shebait (147). In 1787, B was the mohant of a shrine of two Hindu idols. On 23-12 1787, a sanad, called deed of pottah of debutter property, was executed in his favour to the following effect:—

"I do grant to you by way of lakheraj debutter the entire mouzah G, together with all that exists thereon. By bestowing your blessing on us, you do enjoy and possess the same with fresh felicity. If I or any of my heirs ever dispossess you, the dispossession shall be ineffectual:"

It appeared from the evidence that the donee received the gift as a gift for the service of the particular idols whose shebait he was, and that the income of the mouzah had ever since been entirely appropriated to that service. In 1860, the succeeding Mohunt, describing himself as "Brittibhogi-holder of debutter," granted a mokurrari pottah, or permanent lease, of the entire mouzah, with the exception of 5 bighas, which were reserved as "set apart as the place of repose for the deity." In that document the mouzah was described as "my long-standing ancestral lakheraj debutter property endowed for the services of the deity."

Held, that the mouzah was the debutter property of the idols, the gift being a gift to the idols of which B, was the then Mohunt, and not one to the Mohunt personally, and descendible to his heirs, in return for blessings bestowed on the donor and his family. The plaintiff claimed to be the rightful shebait of a consecrated picture or idol, to which peculiar sanctity was attached by the Bullav Acharjee sect or community of Vaishnavites; and as incident thereto he claimed the things which had been offered to the idol, and the possession of a temple in Calcutta in which the idol had for some years been located. His claim was disputed by P, the principal defendant.

The plaintiff was the representative by primogeniture of the founder of the Bullav Acharjee community. All the male members of the family were in their lifetime esteemed by their community as partaking of the Divine essence, and as entitled to veneration and worship; but the head of the family had the precedence, and was styled the Tickut. The plaintiff was the Tickut at the date of suit. The plaintiff's grand-father, named Dowjee, was Tickut in his day. In the year 1825 he paid a visit to Calcutta and presented to his disciples there a consecrated portrait of himself, which had ever since been worshipped, and which was the subject of contention in the suit. It was known as the Thakoor Dowjee. The plaintiff, as the founder's heir, would presumably be entitled to the shebaitship of the Thakoor, and the question was whether the plaintiffs' family had ever intervened in the affairs of the Thakoor since the year 1825.

It appeared that one G was ordinary officiating priest of the Thakoor from 1860 or 1861 to 1877, that when, during ———Founder of—Who is—Evidence.

The plaintiff claimed to be the rightful Shebait of a consecrated picture or idol, to which peculiar sanctity was attached by the Bullav Acharjee sect or community of Vaishnavites; and as incident thereto he claimed the things which had been offered to the idol, and the possession of a temple in Calcutta in which the idol had for some years been located.

The plaintiff was the representative by primogeniture of the founder of the Bullav Acharjee community. All the male members of the family were in their lifetime esteemed by their community as partaking of the Divine essence, and as entitled to veneration and worship; but the head of the family had the precedence, and, was styled the Tickut. The plaintiff was the Tickut at the date of suit. His grandfather was named Doujee, and he was Tickut in his day. In 1825 he paid a visit to Calcutta and presented to his disciples there a conscerated portrait of himself, which had ever since been worshipped. and which was the subject of contention in the suit. It was known as the Thakoor Dowjee, was one of the very numerous presentments of Krishna, and was shown by the evidence to have attracted many worshippers.

———English or other foreign legal conceptions—Importation of—Permissibility.

There are two systems of law in force in India, both self contained and both wholly independent of each other, and wholly independent of foreign and outside legal conceptions. In each there are well-recognized rules relating to their religious and charitable institutions. From the year 1774 the Legislature, British and Indian, has affirmed time after time the absolute enjoyment of their laws and customs so far as they are not in conflict with the statutory laws, by Hindus and Mahomedans. It would be a serious inroad into their rights if the rules of the Hindu and Mahomedan laws were to be construed with the light of legal conceptions borrowed from abroad, unless perhaps where they are absolutely, so to speak, in pari materia. The vice of this method of construction by analogy is well illustra ed in the case in I.L.R. 27 M. 435, where a mahant's position was attempted to be explained by comparing it with that of a bishop and of a beneficed elergyman in England under the Ecclesiastical law (310). ———The constitution and rules of religious brotherhoods attached to Hindu temples are by no means uniform in their character, and the important principle to be observed by the Courts is to ascertain, if that be possible, the special laws and usages governing the particular community whose affairs become the subject of litigation, and to be guided by them (228).

After the death of the preceptor the disciple so chosen is installed in the gaddi, and takes by succession the property which has been held by his predecessor." The language last quoted cannot be taken in any sense as a statement of the general law of India. Any contention to that effect would not be in accordance with Sir Charles Turner's own views, he having made this plain in the succeeding passage of his judgment : " We do not, of course, mean to lay down that the property may not in some cases be held on different conditions and subject to different incidents." MOHUNT OF—ADOPTION OF CHELA BY.

———Custom of—Proof of.

The question in the appeal related to the right to succeed as mohunt of a muth, situated in Puri, near the temple of Juggernath. The rule of succession to the muth was proved to be that the mohunt for the time being had a power to select his successor from amongst his chelas ; that, in the absence of appointment, a chela succeeded, and, if there were more chelas than one, the eldest succeeded ; and that, in the absence of a chela, the mohunt's gurbhai or co-chela succeeded. The appellant claimed to have been validly adopted as his chela by the late Mohunt of the muth, and the question was whether he had been so adopted.

Held, on the evidence, reversing the High Court and restoring the Sub-Judge, that the appellant had been validly adopted by the deceased mohunt as his chela. (Sir Richard Couch.) MOHUNT BHUGABAN RAMANUJ DAS v. MOHUNT ROGHUNUNDUN RAMANUJ DAS. (1895) 22 I. A. 94 = 22 C. 843 = 6 Sar. 536.

Held, on the evidence, that the mohunt was not disqualified by leprosy from making an adoption (106).

It is improbable that the mohunts and adhikaris would have taken part in the ceremonies of adoption—religious ceremonies—if it were known or there was reason for thinking that the mohunt who made the adoption was afflicted with leprosy, which disqualified him from performing those ceremonies. In this case there is no medical evidence, and there is evidence that the mohunt who made the adoption till a few days before his death performed ceremonies which, if he was suffering from leprosy, he was incapable of performing. It was argued that no one would like to interfere; but it may reasonably be thought that there would have been some remonstrance or attempt to persuade him not to perform the ceremonies by some of the persons around him, or by mohunts or adhikaris of other muths (105-6.) MOHUNT OF—GRANT TO—(Contd.)

———Religious and non-religious properties subject of—Management of—Right of—Heir of grantee entitled to and holding office of mohunt—Other heirs of grantee—Rights of.

About the year 1793, a holy man, S, was brought by the then Raja of Tanjore from a mutt or religious institution at a neighbouring place, and was constituted by the Raja his guru or spiritual preceptor. Properties, both non-religious and religious, were granted at various times to S by the Raja. The objects for which the properties were given to S were described in the deeds as being for the purpose of perpetually conducting a food chathram near the tomb of another holy man, and in one case for the purpose of making an agraharam by building houses round about the holy place. The grants of the religious or charitable lands made to S described them as being for the purpose of inam and for the purpose of perpetually conducting or establishing the defined charity.

S and his descendants in regular succession became gurus to the Raja as long as the Raj remained, and were installed by the Rajah for the time being with certain ceremonies, one of the most important being the placing of the new guru on the gaddi. After the escheat of the Tanjore Raj, the adopted son of the last Rajah installed the first defendant, the eldest son of the last holder of the office as his guru.

The confirmation grants issued by the Government, as the result of inquiries made as to the nature of the grants of the religious lands, were in a different form from that used in the confirmation grants of the non-religious lands. Each was described as a title-deed granted to the manager for the the time being of the charity, which was then described. By the deed the title of the manager was acknowledged, and the inam was confirmed to him and his successors. There was no personal inam.

In a suit by one of the younger sons of R against the 1st defendant, his eldest son, and the 2nd defendant, another son of R, for the settlement of a scheme for the management of the religious and charitable properties, held that there was sufficient indication in the documents and in the surrounding circumstances of the case that a devolution of the management to the heirs of the original donee was inconsistent with the purposes of the founder when he created the endowments (7-8); that the intention of the founder must be deemed to have been that his religious charities should be administered by the man who was the head of the mutt, to which of course the eldest son of the previous holder would naturally succeed, the office being indivisible among the members of the family; that the 1st defendant, as the head of the mutt, was pointed out as the natural head and administrator of religious charity; and that there was no jurisdiction in the Indian Court to settle a scheme, the only object of which would be to take away the sole power of management from the eldest son (9).

Quaere whether the rules laid down in some of the cases for the devolution of the management of private charities such as the support of a family idol would be applicable to charities of the class in question (7). (Sir Robert Phillimore.) SETHURAMASWAMIAR v. MERUSWAMIAR.

Even in cases where the reigning mahant of a muth has a right of selecting his successor, the nomination must fall upon one who is competent to hold the office. For instance, the person chosen may be disqualified by reason of bodily deformity or bodily disease such as leprosy, of disease of the mind, or of the leading of a life which is immoral or is inconsistent with the religious vows of the brotherhood. In all such cases, the nomination would be void. The contracting of marriage and the begetting of children is a ground of disqualification, where, by the custom of the muth, the mahant must be a religious chela and celibate (80). The question was whether the appellant was the lawful dhurmakartah or trustee of the ancient temple at Rameswaram, According to the established usage of the religious foundation in question each dhurmakartah initiated a vellala layman and made him an ascetic and thereupon appointed him as his successor, whilst in office and shortly before his death. The question for decision was whether the appointment of the appellant was in accordance with that usage.

The last lawful dhurmakartah was one S. A suit was brought against him, and three other persons who were said to be agents and managers under him, alleging an embezzlement of money belonging to the temple by him and his agents. By the judgment of the District Judge given in that suit on 2—3—1883, it was found that S was responsible for the whole sum found to be embezzled, and a decree was given against him for that sum with interest. He was also directed to be removed from the trusteeship of the temple. On the same day an order was made by the District Court appointing a manager to be in charge of the temple until a new Pandaram was appointed according to law. The judgment of the District Judge was confirmed on appeal by the High Court on 30—1—1884. Subsequently to 2—3—1883, and before January 1884, S was charged with criminal breach of trust, and was afterwards convicted of it and sentenced to suffer imprisonment.

On 30—1—1884, the day on which the High Court confirmed the order of romoval, and whilst he was under the charge of criminal breach of trust, S executed a deed of appointment appointing the appellant his successor in the office of dhurmakartah of the said devastanam, muth, etc.

Held, affirming the courts below, that the appointment was not in accordance with the usage, and was invalid (154).

G, the then properly appointed and duly installed mahant of a math, purported to appoint as mahant one N. Shorty after, that is, in August of 1918, G, as mahant, appointed one S as his successor. In October of 1918, S executed a document which, after reciting that he (S) was not conversant with the customs and had no insight into the management of the ilaqas appertaining to the gaddi, and that there might be ill consequences to the math in consequence, and also that, on account of the affairs of the gaddi, he could not prosecute his studies well, went on to say :—

" It is also my intention that I should sever my connection with it and pass my days for some time out-station and prosecute my studies and acquire the qualifications of a gaddi-nashin mahant. Therefore I return to my guru G all the powers which I had acquired under the document mentioned above, dated the 3rd of August, 1918"—that is, the document of appointment—" for good management of the gaddi and the ilaqas appeartaining thereto. My guru G shall have right (haq) to exercise at present and also in future all the powers which he used to exercise before as mahant gaddi-nashin. I shall have no objection till I acquire full literary qualifications and the qualifications to make management and those of a faqir (ascetic) as required for the gaddi."

Held that, on the right construction of the deed of October 1918, S did not thereby abdicate entirely from the position of mahant, but merely appointed G to act as his deputy.

Every phrase in the deed, if full effect be given to it, seems to indicate that S desired to remain Mahant, that he was absenting himself for a time, and that he was for the time appointing a delegate to act for him in his duties during his absence. That intention seems to be made plain by all the words, which seem to point to a mere temporary absence and to his intention to remain as Mahant.

Semble. the deed by which N purported to relinquish his office was effective to transfer to G the mahantship and the property, and N in executing it meant, before he resigned, to transfer the spiritual rights and temporal right to G and effectively did so.

Their Lordships, however, declined to allow the point as to the true effect of the deed executed by N to be raised for the first time before them on the ground that it would depend, or might depend, very largely upon questions of fact. The Mohunt of a Mutt with a number of minor asthals, the Mohuntship of all of which had by usage been held by one man, executed a will in 1908, appointing the 1st respondent chief chela and malik and Gaddinishin Mohunt like himself. In 1918, he executed two new wills on the same day. By the 1st, he named the 1st respondent as his successor in regard to one of the minor asthals, and bequeathed to him the income thereof, and some lands appurtenant to another minor asthal. The second will recited the effect of the first, and bequeathed to R all the rest of the property of which the executant was possessed, and appointed him Gaddinishin Mohunt. Both the wills provided that, in the event of the death of either appointee without appointing a successor, the other Mohunt should succeed.

Shortly after the death of the executant, disputes arose between R and the 1st respondent. They were, however, settled by an arrangement embodied in two ekrarnamas whereby the provisions of the two wills were recognised and each of the parties entered into possession of their respective offices as conferred by the two wills. R died soon after, having appointed the appellant his successor. Thereupon, the 1st respondent instituted a suit disputing the title of the appellant and making a claim to be the sole Mohunt. In form the suit was not brought by the 1st respondent but by the two idols acting through him as their alleged shebait.

D, a Mohunt, appointed L by will to be his successor and representative in the shebaitship, and as such representative to perform the religious duties in the usual manner. If he studies the shastras for a short time he may become a fit person, therefore you shall keep him under you, and instruct him in the shastras. When you will find yourself incapable of fulfilling the duties aforesaid, you will appoint the said G in your place as mohunt. You shall not be able to act otherwise.

Held that the will, in its true construction, did not give G an absolute, positive, unqualified right at any time to the mohuntship, even on the incapacity of L to perform the duties of mohunt.

Their Lordships think, until L becomes incapable, no trust or duty is suggested, and that even when L becomes incapable, it cannot be put higher than as a gift in the nature of a precatory trust—that is, one requesting L to perform the wishes of the Testator, and to appoint G his successor, provided he found that the incapacity which then existed in G (who was not then of sufficient age to be appointed mohunt) should cease to exist at the time when L was unable to perform those duties (427-8). Held that, if the evidence had proved that the title to succeed depended solely upon the nomination or appointment by the deceased mohunt, and the installation was only the giving effect to it, the failure to prove that averment in the plaint would not have been considered as fatal to the plaintiff's case (105). The appeal arose out of a suit brought by the first of the appellants for a declaration of right in respect of the moveable property and for possession of the immoveable property of one K, Goshain, the deceased mohunt of a religious establishment. The plaintiff claimed the office of mohunt and the land and property belonging to it as the disciple of K appointed by the latter to succeed him. The plaintiff also alleged that the sect to which the deceased K belonged installed him to the gaddi after K's demise.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the evidence failed in proving that the deceased mohunt (K) had power to appoint his successor, and that the Goshains (the sect to which K belonged) were bound to instal the disciple that he appointed (106).

What was done by K, which is called his will, was not according to the custom proved sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover the property (106). (Sir Richard Couch.) GENDA PUR v. CHHATRA PURI.

———Vacancy in—Transfer invalid of office and of properties by reigning Mohunt and abdication by him in pursuance thereof if creates—Appointment of successor in case of though transferor alive.

In a case in which, according to the custom of an asthal, the mahant should be a celibate, the 1st defendant, the then mahant, made a will in 1890 nominating his nephew, defendant No. 2, to succeed him. In 1897, he (defendant No. 1) executed a deed purporting to constitute defendant No. 2 mahant in his place, and made over to him the properties of the asthal subject to certain conditions. By an ekrarnamah entered into by the defendants in 1904 it was agreed that the third defendant, the brother of the 2nd defendant, should succeed the latter as mahant. In a suit instituted in 1906 by the appellant, who claimed to be senior bairagi chela of the 1st defendant and to be entitled as such to succeed him as mahant, it was found that defendant No. 2 was a married man who had children and was as such disqualified to be mahant of the suit asthal and that the deeds executed by the 1st defendant in his favour purporting to be a transfer of the mahantship were invalid and ineffectual for the purpose. The 3rd defendant had died in the course of the litigation.

Before their Lordships the question arose whether, in the circumstances of the case, the 1st defendant being alive, the mahantship ought not to be held to revert to him.

It appeared that the 1st defendant had for years relinquished the mahantship. Since at least 1897 he had retired from office, and had made over to defendant No. 2 all his duties together with the properties of the asthal. He had a mutation of names effected in the Collector's register in respect of the villages belonging to the math. He had thus abdicated all his functions, and, as he admitted himself, his position was no more than that of any other worshipper.

Held that the 1st defendant's installation of defendant No. 2 on the gaddi and his own retirement from the mahantship created a vacancy in the office (90).

Held further, that, as the 1st defendant's having been a party to deeds, and especially to the ekrarnama of 1904, which were of a nature inconsistent with his duty and position as guardian of the suit religious institution, his abdication must be accepted as a governing fact in the case, and that the plaintiff, on whom even according to the defendant's case the succession would have devolved in the absence of an appointment, and who was not alleged to be disqualified from holding the office, was entitled to the same (90-1). Although, in the case of mortgages granted over the security of an adhinam or mutt by the head thereof the onus lies upon the mortgagee, or those in his right, to prove that the debt was a necessary expense of the institution itself, it is a circumstance of great weight when holder after holder of the headship recognises and deals with the debt on that basis ; and as time goes on this may itself come to be a not unimportant element of probation upon the issue. Where,therefore, in such a case, the transaction is challenged after a lapse of time and when the parties to it have died or disappeared and the material evidence is not forthcoming, a court is much more easily satisfied that the debt was properly incurred than where the transaction was itself recent and could therefore be the subject of more exact evidence, or where the transaction, although remote, has been the subject of challenge or dispute by those charged with the interests of the institution (Lord Shaw.) MURUGESAM PILLAI v. MANICKA VASAGAR PANDARA.

The suit was one in ejectment. The plaint did not even allege a case of misappropriation by the appellants and the appellants admitted they were trustees.

The evidence showed that for a period of 80 years trustees represented by the appellants had had possession and management of the village and had applied the income to the purposes of the institution and that they were recorded as trustees in the Inam Register of 1864, which mentioned the assent of the Zemindar, from whose predecessors the original title to the land had flowed. Held that the respondent had no title to the village (p. 224.)

The appellant, being the mohunt of the matt at Tirpuntal, sued the mohunt of the mutt at Benares to establish the plaintiff's right to manage and superintend as proprietor the mutt and Chutter affairs at Benares and the temple of Sri Kedareshur, and to recover property belonging thereto, and to have an account of receipts and disbursements relative to the same. The plaintiff's case was that the mutt at Tirpuntal was what might be called the parent mutt, that the mutt at Benares was subordinate thereto, that the mohunt of the Tirpuntal mutt had jurisdiction and power over the subordinate mutt at Benares and as incident thereto the right of appointing and removing the mohunt of the Benares mutt, who was merely agent of the mohunt of the parent mutt; and that the defendant acted illegally in setting up an independent title in himself and in disobeying the orders of the plaintiff. The defendant's case was that the mutt at Benares of which he was the mohunt was not subordinate to the mutt at Tirpuntal and that he was in no sense the agent of the plaintiff but was the real proprietor in possession and occupation by right of succession to his ancestors.

Held, on the evidence affirming the High Court, that the original foundation was the mutt at Benares and that the establishment at Tirpuntal was only subordinate thereto, and that the plaintiff had therefore failed to establish either that he was the proprietor of the property at Benares, or that the defendant was merely his agent.

It is right and reasonable that judgments obtained against a former shebait of an idol in respect of debts properly and necessarily incurred by him for the service and benefit of the idol should be binding upon succeeding Shebaits, who, in fact, form a continuing representation of the idol's property. Before, however, applying the principle of res judicata to judgments of this character, the courts should take care to be satisfied that the decrees, relied upon are untainted by fraud or collusion, and that the necessary and proper issues were raised, tried, and decided in the suits which led to them (152-3).

If such debts, and the judgments founded on them, were not held to be thus binding on successors, the consequence would be that no Shebait would be able to obtain assistance in times of need ; for, on an opposite view of the law, he might defeat the creditors who had afforded it, by at once transferring the property to other Shebaits (152-3) (*Sir Montague E. The estate of a deceased shebait is entitled to be reimbursed all sums properly expended by him in the preservation of the trust estate, as for instance, all moneys paid in respect of Government revenue and the like. It is also entitled to be reimbursed all moneys properly expended by him in defending his position as shebait against an unsuccessful claimant.

The estate of a deceased shebait is similarly entitled to be reimbursed all moneys properly expended in performing the obligations imposed upon him by the founder.

The right of indemnity is incident to the position of a trustee. The liability in respect of that indemnity is the first charge on the trust estate.

Where the income of a debutter estate suffered diminution owing to the wrongful acts of a rival claimant to the office of the shebait, but it was not unreasonable to expect that, on the cessation of those acts, or, on the interposition of the court, whose aid had been invoked, the income would be sufficient to defray the expenditure incurred in the meantime by the shebait and paid out of his own personal estate, held that in the absence of any provision by the founder directing that the shebait must not spend more than what he at any time actually received, and create no outstanding claim against the estate the shebait was entitled to be reimbursed the moneys so spent by him out of his personal estate. ——Right of—Claim by them inconsistent with or opposed to purpose which founder had in view in establishing worship—Effect.

The rule laid down in 16 I. A. 137 that "According to Hindu Law, when the worship of a thakoor has been founded, the shebaitship is held to be vested in the heirs of the founder, in default of evidence that he has disposed of it otherwise, or there has been some usage, course of dealing, or some circumstances to shew a different mode of devolution," must from the very nature of the right, be subject to the condition that the devolution in the ordinary line of descent is not inconsistent with or opposed to the purpose the founder had in view in establishing the worship.

In a suit brought by the plaintiffs claiming the shebaitship of a Hindu temple belonging to the Ballavacharya Gossains on the ground of their being the heirs-at-law of the founder, it appeared that, being Bhats, and not belonging to the Gossain Kul, the plaintiffs were not competent to be shebaits of a Ballav temple where the rites were performed according to the Ballav ritual, which they could not perform. Held, that to allow the plaintiff's claim would defeat the purpose for which the worship was established. The second deed of partition does afford ground for suspicion. It appoints as a shebait one whom no prudent person would appoint a trustee, one an actual insolvent. REMOVAL FROM—GROUNDS.

———Trustee—Removal of—English rules as to — Applicability.

The grounds for removing a shebait from his office may not be identical with those upon which a trustee would be removed in this country (England). The close intermingling of duties and personal interests which together make up the office of shebait may well prevent the closeness of the analogy, but as part of the office it is indisputable that there are duties which must be performed, that the estate does need to be safeguarded and kept in proper custody, and if it be found that a man in the exercise of his duties has put himself in a position in which a court thinks that the obligations of his office can no longer be faithfully discharged that is sufficient ground for his removal.

Where the High Court held that the protracted litigations, due to the unwise acts of a hereditary shebait, by which the debutter estate had become heavily burdened with debts, and the circumstances associated with the claims which the shebait was seeking to establish against the estate for litigation expenses, were such as to render it undesirable that he should continue in the office, and the High Court accordingly made a decree directing his removal from the office, their Lordships affirmed the judgment of the High Court. Notwithstanding that property devoted to religious purposes is, as a rule, inalienable, it is competent for the shebait of property dedicated to the worship of an idol, in the capacity as shebait and manager of the estate, to incur debts and borrow money for the proper expenses of keepiug up the religious worship, repairing the temples or other possessions of the idol, defending hostile litigious attacks, and other like objects. The power, however, to incur such debts must be measured by the existing necessity for incurring them. The authority of the shebait of an idol's estate would appear to be in this respect analogous to that of the manager for an infant heir as laid down in the case of Hanooman Persaud Panday (151-2).

DEBT OF SHEBAIT—(Contd.)

It is only in an ideal sense that property can be said to belong to an idol; and the possession and management of it must in the nature of things be entrusted to some person as shebait or manager. It would seen to follow that the person so entrusted must of necessity be empowered to do whatever may be required for the service of the idol, and for the benefit and preservation of its property, at least to as great a degree as the manager of an infant heir. If this were not so, the estate of the idol might be wasted or destroyed, and its worship discontinued. for want of the necessary funds to preserve nnd maintain them (152). (*Sir Montague E. The settled rule of administration with regard to such institutions under the law of India is that their administration must be, not for the personal ends of the trustee or trustees, but entirely for and on behalf of and in the interest of the institution itself (p. 223). The trustee cannot employ surplus income for his personal use. His duty is to refrain from the personal enjoyment of such surplus and to add the same to the capital of the estate to be administered and this law also applies to the property of a math or asthal, whether the title to the same is in a gurukal as spiritual head of the institution—which is the ordinary case ———Antecedent debts on very oppressive terms—Mortgage on easy terms for paying off—Validity—Proof of necessity for earlier loans if condition of.

The learned Judges of the High Court appear to be of opinion that the procurement by the shebait of a muth of a loan of money on easy terms for the purpose of paying off antecedent loans obtained on very oppressive terms can never be held to be a necessary proceeding unless the obtaining of the oppressive loan was, at the time it was obtained, a matter of necessity also. This view is not correct (265).

It is the immediate, not the remote cause, the causa causans, of the borrowing which has to be considered (267).

Where therefore, the immediate cause of the borrowing was the Muth's need of money to carry on and pay for its services, but the remote cause of the Muth's need was due to the profligate expenditure of the shebait, held that a mortgage executed by the shebait for such immediate cause was binding on the muth (267). Where, in recording a finding that an ancient custom existed authorising and empowering a shebait to alienate debutter lands at a fixed rent or in consideration of a premium, whether he was constrained so to do by some necessity or the contrary, and whether the alienation was a benefit to the debutter estate or not, the District Munsif observed: "I must find that for a very long time permanent leases of temple land are being granted and that the alienees are in undisputed possession thereof", and the subordinate Judge stated: "If custom were needed to justify such a grant, the District Munsif has found upon the evidence (and I agree in his finding) that such local usage does obtain in the village in question." The custom is perfectly reasonable, and is not opposed to public policy," their Lordships observed that there could scarcely be a more glaring instance of the misapplication of the word "Custom" or a more remarkable instance of forgetfulness of essentials of a custom which modifies the ordinary law. Where a shebait of a Hindu temple leased out on permanent cowli a house site belonging to the temple on which there were some ruins and which was not fetching any income, on a premium of Rs. 93-12-0 to the trustees of another charity and the succeeding shebait sued for a declaration that the permanent lease was invalid and for recovery of possession of the site after demolishing the buildings which the lessees had erected on the site, held that the grant of a lease in perpetuity of debutter lands at a fixed rent required to be justified by unavoidable necessity and that an absolute alienation of the property in perpetuity in consideration of a premium also required to be justified by the same kind of necessity.

There is no distinction in this respect between agricultural lands and building sites.

It is a breach of duty on the part of a shebait, unless constrained thereto by unavoidable necessity, to grant a lease in perpetuity of debutter lands at a fixed rent, however, adequate that rent may be at the time of granting, by reason of the fact that by this means the debutter estate is deprived of the chance it would have, if the rent were variable, of deriving benefit from the enhancement in value in the future of the lands leased. ———Validity—Presumption—Lapse of time—Effect.

Although the manager for the time being of a religious charity has no power to make a permanent alienation of temple property in the absence of proved necessity for the alienation, yet the long lapse of time between the alienation and the challenge of its validity is a circumstance which enables the court to assume that the original grant was made in exercise of that extended power.

Their Lordships have no hesitation in applying the above doctrine to the present case. If in fact the grant, the validity of which is in question, was made by a person who possessed the limited power of dealing under which a shebait holds lands devoted to the purposes of religious worship, yet none the less there is attached to the office in special and unusual circumstances, the power of making a wider grant than one which enures only for his life. At the lapse of 100 years, when every party to the original transaction has passed away, and it becomes completely impossible to ascertain what were the circumstances which caused the original grant to be made, it is only following the policy which the courts always adopt, of securing as far as possible quiet possession to people who are in apparent lawful holding of an estate, to assume that the grant was lawfully and not unlawfully made. ———Validity—Purchase benami in name of another—Rule applicable to such cases.

There is a dissimilarity between a shebait and trustees to whom the rule against the purchase by a trustee of an estate of which he is trustee applies; and it follows that rules and decisions which depend upon the special conditions attached to the particular class would not of necessity apply to another where these conditions did not exist. But the rule forbidding the purchase of an estate by a person who stands in regard to his dealings with it in a fiduciary relationship is, however, general in its application.

Held that a purchase of debutter property by its shebait benami in the name of his son and without disclosing that he was the real purchaser was invalid.

Considerations such as that the purchase was for abundant price, one largely above the market value of the property, cannot have weight where the purchase is challenged upon the grounds in the present suit.

The rule laid down by Lord St. Leonards that even if an attorney or agent can show that he is entitled to purchase, yet if instead of openly purchasing, he purchases in the name of a trustee or agent without disclosing the fact, no such purchase as that can stand for a single moment, applies to this case. If part of the purchase money only was required for the repairs of the idol, or was represented to have been so required, and this was bona fide believed in by the grantees, the deed of sale by the Shebait would not be wholly void by reason that some of the money was raised for another purpose. It would then come to this, that too much of the idol's property may have been granted, and that a less quantity of land than that included in the grants would have sufficed to raise the money required for the temples; but that would not be a sufficient ground for setting aside the deed altogether (65). Attractive and lucrative as money-lending business may be in India, a shebait would not be justified in selling debutter land solely for the purpose of getting capital to embark in the money-lending business. And no authority has been cited giving any countenance to the notion that a shebait is entitled to sell debutter lands solely for the purpose of so investing the price of it as to bring an income larger than that derived from the probably safer and certainly more stable property, the debutter land itself. ———Turns—Management by—Arrangement as to—Validity.

The manager of a temple (dedicated to the public worship of the deity in whose honour it was founded) is by virtue of his office the administrator of the property attached to it. As regards the property, the manager is in the position of a trustee. But as regards the service of the temple and the duties that appertain to it, he is rather in the position of the holder of an office or dignity which may have been originally conferred on a single individual, but which, in course of time, has become vested by descent in more than one person. In such a case, it is not unusual, and it is certainly not improper, for the parties interested to arrange among themselves for the due execution of the functions belonging to the office in turn or in some settled order and sequence. There is no breach of trust in such an arrangement, nor any improper delegation of the duties of a trustee. Such an arrangement is one which will be sanctioned by the court if its authority is invoked. It is one which the parties interested are competent to make without applying to the court. ———Turns—Management by—Family arrangement—Validity of—Presumption of, from long unbroken usage—Alteration of—Remedy of party who has taken benefit under it—Estoppel.

The office of manager of a Hindu temple (dedicated to the public worship of the deity in whose honour it was founded, and endowed with the revenue of three villages) was hereditary in a family of which the appellant and respondent were both members, but the family had no beneficial interest in the property or in the income of the temple. The office of manager was at one time vested in M, the grandfather of the respondent and the great-grandfather of the appellant. On the death of M, the office devolved by inheritance on his male descendants by his two wives, four by each wife, or eight in all. One member of each branch took the management for one year in alternate succession until 1881-2. About that time the members of the junior branch renounced or relinquished their claim to the office in favour of the respondent, a member of the senior branch. During the nineteen years immediately preceding the institution of the suit (referred to below), in each cycle of 8 years, there had been a settled order of succession among the members of the senior branch, the respondent having had 5 turns, and the appellant and the other two representatives of the senior branch one turn each.

In accordance with the above arrangement the appellant held the office of manager of the temple, and the property belonging to it, from 15—7—1898 to 13—7—1899. On the expiration of that year it was the respondent's turn to hold office for the next years—one year in his original right and two years in right of the junior branch. The appellant handed over the temple to the respondent, but he kept back the jewels and retained or retook possession of the villages with which the temple was endowed. In a suit by the respondent to recover the jewels and the villages, held, (1) the unbroken usage for a period of 19 years was as against the appellant conclusive evidence of a family arrangement to which the court was bound to give effect; (2) it was perfectly competent to the parties to enter into such an arrangement without applying to the court; (3) the arrangement was not intended to be merely temporary, nor could it be regarded as precarious; and (4) the arrangement was binding upon the parties until altered by the court or superseded by a new scheme effected with the concurrence of all parties interested.

Twice during the period of 19 years the appellant has, in his proper turn, enjoyed the position of manager for a year. If the appellant wishes to set aside the arrangement, and to have a new scheme settled, he must take proper proceedings. But it is not for him, at his will and pleasure, to disturb an arrangement of which he has on more than one occasion taken the benefit. (Lord Macnaghten.) RAMANATHAN CHETTI v. MURUGAPPA CHETTI.

RAMESWARAM TEMPLE.

——Collector's interference with affairs of, between 1815 and 1828, if on behalf of zemindar or in right of Government's right of superintendence.

In a suit in which the question related to the right of the zemindars of Ramnad either to appoint, or to confirm the election of, the pandaram or head of the pagoda of Rameswaram, it appeared that, from 1815 until 1828, during the whole of which time both the zemindary and the pagoda were under attachment, the pagoda was managed by the pandaram for the time being under the control of the collectors of the district, even in minute details. From that evidence counsel for the zemindar sought to draw the inference that the Collector's interference arose from his representing the zemindar's interest, in other words, from his acting in virtue of the rights of the zemindar. The evidence showed that the pagoda had not been attached as part of the zemindary, and that it was not until after the zemindary had been attached in consequence of a disputed succession, that the pagoda was placed under attachment on account of the alleged misconduct of the pandaram.

Held, that in view of the fact that the pagoda had been attached for the alleged misconduct of the pandaram, and in view of the powers of superintendence entrusted to the Collectors as agents of the Government, both before and under the Regulation of 1817, the interference of the Collectors ought to be referred to the exercise of those powers (235). A suit brought by the hereditary trustee of a Hindu temple, for a declaration that the defendants, members of the Shanar community, were not entitled to enter the temple and for an injunction restraining them from doing so, was decreed by the Subordinate Judge on the finding that the plaintiff had proved that by custom the defendants were not among the people for whose worship the temple existed. The defendants appealed to the High Court and, pending the appeal, a petition, signed by the plaintiff and the defendants, was preferred on behalf of the latter, stating that the parties had effected a compromise of the matters in suit, and praying that the compromise might be recorded and a decree passed in accordance therewith. The agreement of compromise recognised the right of the defendants and their caste people of free access to and of worshipping in the suit temple in the same manner and to the same extent as such rights were enjoyed by Sudra sects of the Hindu community.

The High Court refused to pass a decree in terms of the compromise on the ground that the agreement of compromise was not a lawful agreement or compromise within the meaning of S. 375 of C. P. C. of 1882.

In a suit instituted by the appellant and another under S. 92 of C. P. C. against the respondent, who was hereditary dharmakarta of a Hindu temple, praying, inter alia, for the defendant's removal from his office, their Lordships found that the whole of the litigation had substantially been occupied by an unfounded assertion, supported by the concoction of accounts—an assertion by the trustee of private ownership in himself and a powerful resistance to the recovery of properties forming the endowments of the temple for the trust which he administered.

Held, that it was not open to their Lordships, on any sound principles either of administration or of law, to permit the continuance of the respondent in the office of dharmakarta (253).

Their Lordships have considerable doubt whether any litigant found to have been guilty of seriously reprehensible conduct of this description could ever have been retained in the office of dharmakarta. The worshippers of the temple, the true beneficiaries in the endowments, are entitled, at least in regard to the trusteeship thereto, as also is a court of law before whom such delinquencies are established, to insist upon the first step towards trustworthiness in administration being taken by the removal of the trustee. The respondents were the representatives of the original rulers of the district in which the suit temple was situated who so continued till the British sovereignty was established over the country in the year 1792. The family of the appellants always held the office of Urallers or managers of the temple, while the Nambidi possessed certain sovereign rights of superintending the temple called Melkoima rights.

As long as since as the year 1845 disputes arose between the ancestors of the appellants and respondents, and a suit was commenced as to the management of the temple, which was settled by a karar on 16—8—1845 ; and in accordance therewith the parties two days afterwards filed a razi withdrawing the suit. The karar provided that the affairs of the temple were to be managed and that the ceremonies were to be performed jointly " just as they were hitherto," and for a period of thirty years afterwards—namely, until 1874—that arrangement was carried out In 1874 fresh disputes sprung up between the Urallers and the Nambidi, and led to a suit in which the Urallers sought to recover certain lands belonging to the temple from a tenant who held under a demise granted by the Samudayam appointed by the Urallers and the Nambidi according to the agreement contained in the karar of 1845. That suit was compromised, and in a razi of 21—11—1874, terms were set out which again determined that there should be a joint management of the affairs of the temple by the Urallers and the Nambidi. That razi was acted upon until the date of the suit out of which the appeal arose, the Urallers and the Nambidi jointly appointing a Samdayam and a Pattawali, and joining in suits to recover temple lands and in applications to execute decrees.

Held, that the state of things which had admittedly continued since 1845 could not be questioned, and that the compromise of their rights, entered into in 1845 and 1874 by the Urallers and Nambidi, was binding upon them and their successors, and conld not be re-opened upon any theory of the extent of the Melkoima right in the abstract.

The usage which has existed for so long a period is the best exponent of the Melkoima right vested in the respondents, a right twice acquiesced in by the appellants or their predecessors in legal proceedings in which the opportunity was afforded of a definite decision as to the rights of the respective families. The position of the shebait the manager or the trustee of a temple is, so far as their power to deal with the endowed lands of the temple is concerned, analogous to the position of a mahant of a math to deal with the endowed lands of a math. They can doubtless sell or mortgage the endowed lands of the temple if there is an actual, special, and unavoidable necessity of the temple to do so, but that necessity would have to be proved by those who alleged that it existed. Except in a case of such unavoidable necessity the shebait, the manager or the trustee of a temple, or the mahant of a math, have no power to sell or mortgage the endowed property in their custody, and obviously they have no right to impair the endowed property by creating or granting in favour of any one rights of permanent occupancy in the endowed lands. Pending an appeal by the defendants in a suit brought by the hereditary trustee of a temple, the trustee entered into a compromise surrendering the decree of the Court below in favour of the temple. The defendants then applied for the passing of a decree in terms of the compromise. Thereupon two of the worshippers of the suit temple, and also the son of the original plaintiff were joined as party-respondents to the appeal, in order that they might oppose the petition of compromise.

Held, that the High Court acted properly in reinforcing the cause of the worshippers of the temple by joining the new plaintiffs as parties to the appeal. (Lord Robertson.) SANKARALINGA NADAN v. RAJA RAJESWARA DORAI.

Before Regulation VII of 1817 the British Government, by virtue of its sovereign power, asserted, as the former rulers of the country had done, the right to visit endowments of this kind (pagodas) and to prevent and redress abuses in their management (232-3). There can be little doubt that this superintending authority was exercised by the old rulers (233). The powers they enjoyed as sovereigns passed to the British Government, and after the advent of the British Government the old rulers can have no rights with respect to the pagodas other than those of a private and proprietary nature, which they can establish by evidence to belong to them (233-4). Long before Regulation VII of 1817, the British Government not only assumed the power to superintend the management of the property and affairs of the pagodas throughout the Peninsula, but exercised its authority through the agency of the Collectors (234). At an early date the power of superintendence was intrusted by the Government to the Board of Revenue, and the Collectors. Regulation VII of 1817, in fact, merely defined the manner in which that power was thenceforth to be excercised (235). (*Sir Montague E. ———Exclusion by custom from—Proof of—Shiva temple—Exclusion of Nadars from.

The appellants belonged to the Nadar or Shanar caste. The question was whether they and the caste to which they belonged had legal right to enter and worship in a temple at Kamudi, which temple was dedicated to the worship of Shiva.

Held, that the respondents, the trustees and worshippers of the temple, had succeeded in proving that by custom the appellants were not among the people for whose worship the particular temple existed.

The circumstances that the appellants, as a matter of fact, worshipped by themselves in a temple of their own, and that they completely failed to prove any resort by persons of their caste to the temple in dispute not merely negatived the case of the appellants that they "have been from time immemorial . . . participating in the pooja and worship" in the disputed temple, but made easy the respondent's further contention that that separation in worship between the two classes was not accidental or voluntary, but rested on a deeper ground (Lord Robertson.) SANKARALINGAM NADAN v. RAJA RAJESWARA DORAI. (1908) 35 I. ———Persons not entitled to participate in—Intrusion into temple of—Trespass for—Suit for—Trustee—Beneficiaries—Right of—Injunction against intruder—Suit by beneficiaries for—Maintainability.

The intrusion of an unbeliever into a place of religious worship might well be a case of substantial interference with the devotions of worshippers. If it were a question of caste and worshippers of a higher caste would be defiled by the presence of a lower caste, as in I.L.R. 7 B. 323, this would be a serious disturbance (55-6).

A claim for an injunction restraining a person not legally entitled to enter into a temple and to attend the religious ceremonies held there involves a claim for an injunction to prevent the repetition of an alleged trespass. It must therefore first be established that there was a trespass and one for which damages, though possibly only nominal, could be recovered. But for trespass upon land the only person to bring the action is the person in possession of the land, that is, the trustee. That a beneficiary or two or three beneficiaries of a trust for public purposes may bring a suit for trespass against an intruder is a novel principle of jurisprudence; and the case is not made stronger by the suggestion that several other beneficiaries agree with them. It may be that in India it would be convenient in some cases to allow such a suit, and the judgment in I.L.R. 7 B. 323 may form a precedent But, if so, the circumstances must be as powerful as in that case. It must be established that the juxtaposition of the two sets of persons is so repugnant to their habits of mind that the entrance of one set into the temple entails the departure of the other, so that it is as it were a trespass to the person (56-7) (Lord Phillimore.) SAKLAT v. BELLA.

Religious Endowment Temple and Mutt—Headship of both vested in same person.

———Principal of the two offices—Which is the.

In a case in which the headship of a mutt and the dharmakartaship of a temple were held by the same person, it was contended that the temple and the mutt were inseparable institutions, that the mutt was the original institution to which the temple became an accretion, and that the head of the mutt must be the head of the temple.

Held, that the evidence, far from supporting the contention urged, showed that the dharmakartaship was the principal office (154).

In the case in which there is evidence in the record of an appointment it is to be the dharmakartah, and this appears to be the principal office. Priority is given to it in the statement in the plaint of the usage. The sub-judge says that the trusteeship being the more important of the two offices almost absorbed the headship of the mutt, so much so that the distinct existence of the mutt was very nearly forgotten, and the succession came to be regarded as for the trusteeship alone. This is proved by the evidence referred to in his judgment (154). (Sir Richard Couch.) RAMALINGAM PILLAI v. VITHILINGAM PILLAI. (1893) 20 I. A. 150 = 16 M. 490 (498) = 6 Sar. 351.

TRUSTEESHIP OF TEMPLE.

———Invalid appointment to—Headship of mutt—Appointment to, if also invalid.

The question was whether the appellant was the lawful dhurmakarta or trustee of the ancient temple at Rameswaram. According to the established usage of the religious foundation each dhurmakartah initiated a Vallala layman and made him an ascetic and thereupon appointed him as his successor, whilst in office and shortly before his death. The appellant claimed to have been so appointed by the last lawful dhurmakartah.

The Courts below, however, concurred in finding that the appointment of the appellant was not made bona fide. The Sub judge, referring to the circumstances which had been proved, said, "all these convince me that the appointment of the plaintiff" (appellant) "was not made bona fide in the interests of the institution, but was for the personol interests of the late trustee." And the High Court concurred in finding that the appellant's appointment was made by the former Pandaram in furtherance of his own interests, and that it was not a bona fide exercise, of his power, if any.

Held, that the finding of both the courts below invalidated the whole appointment, and that it applied to the headship of the mutt which followed the principal office of dhurmakartah as well as to the office of dhurmakartah (154-5).

DEED OF—CONSTRUCTION.

———Purchase by one of members prior to—Amount borrowed on bonds or otherwise for—Payment of share of, by other member—Provision for—Amount advanced from private funds if can be recovered under.

Two brothers, who were, in all respects, a joint and undivided family, separated, but there was no regular partition of the estate. The effect of the separation was that the lands remained undivided, but each brother, being no longer a member of a joint Hindu family, took his share of the rents. The younger brother had then a large claim against the elder brother, who had been the manager of the estate, in respect of the rents and profits received previous to the partition. The separation of the brothers continued for little more than 11 months; they then re-united. During the period of separation, however, the elder brother purchased a putni taluq. On the re-union it was expressly agreed, by a deed, that those acquisitions which the elder brother had made whilst the separation continued, should all go into the joint fund. It was expressly provided that the entire property, whether ancestral, or then acquired, or thereafter to be acquired, was to be joint, and enjoyed in equal moieties. The deed further provided that whatever the elder brother had borrowed on bonds given in his name, or whatever the two had borrowed on their joint security, in order to provide the consideration money for the purchase of the Putnee, should be a charge on the joint estate, and should be liquidated out of the joint property. There was, however, no provision in the deed whatever for the repayment, out of the joint property, to the elder brother, of any funds which he might have advanced, or might have alleged that he had advanced, on the same account, out of his private money.

After a short period of re-union, the two brothers again separated, and the elder brother brought a suit against the younger for the recovery of the moiety of the money alleged to have been paid by the elder brother out of his private funds for the purchase of the Putnee. Held, on a construction of the deed, that he was not entitled to recover anything from the defendant, except in regard to moneys actually borrowed on bond or otherwise (410-1). ———Mortgage of—Validity.

At the date of the mortgage bond of 1877, Hulas Kuar, as the widow and heir of Khairati, the last male owner, was the owner of his estate, but with a restricted power of alienation. Achhan Kunwar was next in succession, and would, if she survived her mother, Hulas Kuar, become her father's heir, and take the estate subject to the same restriction. Enayet, the son of Achhan kunvar, was one of the two male heirs next in succession to the restricted estate who would be full owners in the event of their surviving their grandmother and mother. Enayet was, moreover, a minor. At the date of the mortgage bond of 1881, Hulas Kuar was dead, Achhan was owner of the property for a daughter's estate with restricted power of alienation, and Enayet was one of the heirs apparent.

In 1877 neither Achhan Kunwar nor Enayet (even if he had been of age) could by Hindu law make a disposition of or bind their expectant interests, nor does the deed apply to any but rights in possession; and in 1881 Enayet was equally incompetent to do so, though the bond purports to bind future rights (189). S, claiming to be the nearest reversionary heir of R, instituted a suit against the mother of R, who had succeeded to his property as his heir, and against alienees of portions of the said property from her. The plaint prayed for a declaration that plantiff was entitled to succeed to the suit property after the death of R's mother, a declaration that the alienations by her were invalid beyond her life, an injunction and the appointment of a receiver. The defendants pleaded, inter alia, that was not the nearest reversioner, and that, after the death of R's mother, her daughter and her son would be entitled to succeed to the property in preferrence to S. During the course of that litigation, the sister of R was made a party defendant and she filed a written statement claiming to be entitled to succeed in preference to S. The High Court found that S was the nearest reversionary heir after the death of R's mother, that the alienations by R's mother were invalid beyond her life, but that S was not entitled to an injunction or the appointment of a receiver. The decree of the High Court declared that the alienations by R's mother were invalid beyond her life and did not bind the reversionary heirs, dismissed the suit in so far as it prayed for an injunction and the appointment of a receiver, but did not contain a declaration that S was the nearest reversioner. In a suit between R's sister and S in respect of the right to succeed to the property of R after his mother's death, held that, although the decree in the prior suit did not contain a declaration that S was the nearest reversioner, the judgment therein might be and ought to be looked at to see what was decided and that in as much as it had decided that S was the nearest reversioner, the decree in the prior suit operated as res judicata in his favour. Held that, though the issues had necessarily been raised and decided, they had been raised and decided only between the parties to the suit (the defendants being the widow and the transferee under her will), and that whenever the inheritance opened by the death of the widow, the decision would have settled nothing as to who should succeed. ———The questions of who is the nearest reversionary heir or what is the class of reversionary heirs fall to be settled at the date of the expiry of the ownership for life or lives. Even when the courts have proceeded, prior to the opening of the succession, to give any declaration, this has heen done for special reasons only, and it is made clear that "Whenever the succession opens by the death of the widow the present decision will have settled nothing as to who should succeed." If a court of law proceeded to make any declaration of right as to who is the reversionary heir of the deceased proprietor such a declaration would be subject to being rendered valueless by the development of events. It would not, after events had developed, be even of authority in regulating or declaring the rights of the reversioner in whose favour such declaration is made as against any other claimant to the character of reversionary heir. A fortiori accordingly, a declaration of right granted before the expiry of the ownership for life or lives would appear to be stamped with something in the nature of futility (209). The Court found that there had been a partition between the plaintiff and the deceased, under which the latter held his share as separate estate, and that, on his death, his widows were entitled to succeed, and that the plaintiff was only presumptively the reversionary heir next in succession to them. Instead of dismissing the suit, the decree made by the Court, however, after affirming the rights of the widows, went on to declare the right of the plaintiff to succeed upon the death of the survivor of them.

Their Lordships observed that the decree was a somewhat extraordinary one (735). (Sir James W. Colvile.) BABOO DOOLI CHAND v. BABOO BRIJ BHOOKUN LAL AWASTI.

The suit is of a peculiar nature, because it is one brought by a person who, even if his own case were true, might probably never have an interest in the property, inasmuch as he can have only a contingent estate during the lifetime of the widow of the last male owner of the property. Such a suit is permitted simply on the ground of the necessity that the contingent reversioner may be under of protecting his contingent interest. ———Alienation by widow—Validity of—Suit contesting.

B, a Hindu, died leaving two widows, and D, a daughter by one of them. In 1873, the widows executed a deed whereby, after stating that with the exception of D there was no heir of their husband or of themselves, they made a gift to her of certain lands and villages, only retaining to themselves a life interest in part of them. Some of the property was described as mouzahs exclusively acquired by the widows out of their own fund, and the rest was described as having been left by their husband B.

D died in 1875, and, in 1876, the plaintiffs, the presumptive heirs of B, subject to the interest of the widows, sued the widows and the daughter of D for a decision that the deed of December 1873 was null and void as regards the reversionary interests of the plaintiffs, and for a declaration that the properties acquired by the widows were part and parcel of their husband's estate.

The questions for decision in the suit were (1) whether by the release to D under the deed of December 1873 the absolute interest became at once vested in her, and therefore the inheritance devolved upon her daughter; and (2) whether properties purchased by the widows out of the profits of their husband's estate became accretions to that estate.

Held that the question of law involved in the case was of such a nature that its decision, though not binding as res judicata between the widows and a new reversioner, would be so strong an authority in point as probably to deter either party from disputing it (157). Later, he made default in payment of his share of revenue of the property; and the appellant, who paid the same, obtained a decree against the mortgagee and purchased the property in execution of his decree.

———Waste by widow—Suit to restrain—Decision in.

A reversionary heir, although having only those contingent interests which are differentiated little, if at all, from a spes successionis, is recognised by Courts of Law as having a right to demand that the estate be kept free from waste and free from danger during its enjoyment by the widow or other owner for life. But a reversionary heir thus appealing to the court truly for the conservation and just administration of the property does so in a representative capacity, so that the corpus of the estate may pass unimpaired to those entitled to the reversion.

This representation is in law founded upon a different set of considerations from those which would seek to stamp the character of reversionary heir upon one individual. The latter operation attempted during the enjoyment of the life estates would necessarily be premature, and might be futile. The former is justified by the considerations of keeping the estate intact for the persons to whom as reversioners it shall ultimately and at the proper time be determined that the estate shall go (209-10). ———Will of last male owner set up by widow—Forgery of—Suit for declaration of.

Reversioners possess individually what has been called a spes successionis, the bare possibility of succeeding to the estate of the last owner in case the widow dies leaving any one of them surviving entitled to take immediate possession after her, unless, of course, the husband has left the power to her to adopt a son. But the spes is common to them all; so is the danger by the widow's act against the interests of the reversioners. The right to sue to set aside that common danger is given for obvious reasons of policy and convenience to the person, who, if the widow died at the moment, would take the estate. But the result, favourable or otherwise, affects the reversioners as a body.

The decision in a suit brought by a person in his capacity of the presumptive reversioner of the last male owner's estate for a declaration that a will set up as his was false and fabricated binds all the reversioners.

———Nature of—Representative suit—Death of plaintiff—Next reversioner's right to continue suit.

A suit brought in the "lifetime of a female owner for a declaration that an adoption made by her is not valid against the inheritance differs in its scope and character from one brought in her lifetime for a declaration that an alienation effected by her is not binding against the inheritance, inasmuch as the former relates to status and involves the adjudication of a right in rem, while the latter raises a question of mere justifiable necessity. But in both "the right to sue" is based on the danger to the inheritance common to all the reversioners which arises from the nature of their rights (128-9).

The Madras High Court has drawn a distinction between a suit brought to challenge an adoption and one to declare an alienation by a qualified owner as not binding beyond the lifetime of the alienor. In the first class of cases it has been recognized that the presumptive reversioner's suit is in a representative character ; in the other, however, chiefly on the ground that the adjudication relating to an alienation in the suit of the presumptive reversioner does not operate as a res judicata against the contingent reversioners, it has been held that these have no right to continue an action brought by him. Although, no doubt, there is great difference in the character of the two classes of suits, the position of the plaintiffs in both instances when closely examined will be found, so far as the right of the contingent reversioner to continue the suit on the death of the plaintiff is concerned, to be the same. The test of res judicata applied by the Madras High Court seems, therefore, to be irrelevant to the inquiry, whether the contingent reversioner is entitled to continue the action brought by the presumptive reversioner. What has to be considered is whether the "right to sue", in the words of the statute, "survives," and if it does, who can continue the action to obtain the relief that is sought ? (129 30). The suit was brought by the appellant, a Hindu widow, against her daughter-in-law who was sued in her own right and also as the guardian of M, whom she had adopted under an authority alleged to have been executed by her deceased husband. The object of the suit was to set aside that adoption, and to have it declared invalid. The principal questions in the suit were (1) whether the deceased did execute the alleged authority to adopt ; and (2) whether, if he did so, he was by reason of his age capable of executing such a document.

If the adoption was invalid, the appellant, if she survived her daughter-in-law, would become entitled on the death of the latter to her son's property ; and that contingent interest was the only locus standi which she had in the suit.

Held that, having regard to the nature of the suit, which was one in which the appellant, upon a remote and contingent interest, an interest which would probably never accrue to her, came into court, not only to destroy the title of a person in possession of an estate, but to destroy his civil status, a more than ordinary burden of proof lay upon the appellant (81-2). ———Remote reversioner—Right of, to be impleaded in suit—Right of, to obtain conduct of suit on proof of laches on plaintiff's part or of collusion between him and widow.

There is nothing to preclude a remote reversioner from joining or asking to be joined in an action brought by the presumptive reversioner (for a declaration that an adoption or an alienation made by a widow or other female heir is not binding beyond the lifetime of the alienor), or even obtaining the conduct of the suit on proof of laches on the part of the plaintiff or collusion between him and the widow or other female whose acts are impugned (130). Under O. 1, R. 1 of C. P. C. of 1908 (which brings the Indian practice into line with the English rule) the contingent reversioners may be joined as plaintiffs in the presumptive reversioner's suit. The right to relief on the part of the reversioners exists severally in order of succession, and arises out of one and the same transaction impugned as invalid and not binding against them as a body ; and the dispute involves a common question of law, namely, the validity or invalidity of the act challenged as incompetently done (132). In a suit by a person claiming to be presumptively entitled to succeed to the estate of the last male owner on the death of his widow for a declaration that a deed of alienation executed by her was not binding against the reversioner, the reversionary character claimed by the plaintiff depended upon proof of a koolachar or family custom set up by him. The High Court, which dismissed the suit, found against the plaintiff on the custom set up by him. On appeal by the plaintiff, their Lordships, being of opinion that the case was not one in which in the exercise of their discretion they ought to grant a declaration of the invalidity of the alienation, set aside the finding of the High Court as to the custom set up, because such a finding was unnecessary (163). In a suit by a presumptive reversioner for a declaration that a deed of alienation executed by the widow of the last male holder in respect of his property is not binding against the reversioner, it is entirely a matter of discretion whether to make any declaration of that kind or to leave the question open until the widow's death (162).

Held that, under the circumstances of the case, their Lordships ought not to make a declaratory decree with reference to the deed of alienation in question (163).

The circumstances relied upon by their Lordships were:—(1) The evidence of necessity for the deed was conflicting and was not such as to enable their Lordships to determine what, if any, portion of the money which formed the consideration for the deed was raised for necessity. A remand of the case for an inquiry on the point was therefore necessary (162).

(2) An inquiry on remand would be attended with considerable expense, and would cause great delay, and if the inquiry should result in a finding favourable to the alienee, the decision might not be final in his favour, because the plaintiff might die in the lifetime of the widow, and the estate might never come to him (163).

(3) There were others who might prove a preferable title to the plaintiff and to the widow, and who, not being parties to the suit, would not be bound by any decision therein (163). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) TEKAIT DOORGA PERSAD SINGH v. TEKAITNI DOORGA KUNWARI.

The High Court made a decree declaring that the plaintiff should be entitled to recover the property after the death of the widow upon the payment of the Rs 14,000.

While approving of that decree, their Lordships, with a view to render the intention of the Court more clear, recommended the addition to the declaration of the words "and to be put in possession of the said property after the decease of the widow on payment to the purchaser of the sum of Rs 14,000." The widows executed a deed whereby, after stating that with the exception of D, there was no heir of their husband or of themselves, they made a gift to her of certain lands and villages, only retaining to themselves a life interest in part of them. Some of the property was described as mouzahs exclusively acquired by the widows out of their own fund, and the rest was described as having been left by their husband. D, died shortly after, leaving a daughter B.

The plaintiffs, claiming to be the presumptive heirs of the last male owner, subject to the interest of the widows, thereupon brought a suit against the widows and B, for a decision that the deed of gift in favour of D, was null and void as regards the reversionary interests of the plaintiffs.

DECLARATION OF INVALIDITY OF—SUIT FOR—(Contd.)

All the defendants contended that the conveyance by coalition with D's inheritance gave her an estate transmissible to her heirs.

The learned Judges of the High Court held that the plaintiff's prayer could not be entertained, because it was clearly competent to the widows to convey their own interest; because as regards the last male owner's original property it was not necessary to construe the deed of gift as doing more; and because as regards the after-purchases the widows only conveyed such legal interest as they believed themselves to hold.

Held, differing from High Court, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the declaration sought for (154-5).

Their Lordships are unable to follow the reasoning of the learned Judges of the High Court, even when confined to the last male owner's original estate. The defendants have not met the plaintiffs by saying that by the conveyance D got nothing more than the widow's interest; they have contended that by coalition with D's inheritance it gave her an estate transmissible to her own heirs. If then the true construction of this transaction be that it passes only the widow's interest, it materially concerns the plaintiffs to have that construction established. In this part of their prayer they ask nothing more favourable to themselves, and as between themselves and the defendants who allege an adverse construction, they are clearly entitled to as much (154-5).

The after-purchases fall under the same observations; and with respect to them two other substantial questions are raised, one of fact and one of law. First, the defendants deny that they were made out of the proceeds of the last male owner's property. Secondly, they contend that such purchases are not to be treated as accretions to the property from the proceeds of which they were made, but belong to the widows who made them (155). ———Right to declaration, though finding as to reversionary character of plaintiff involved in declaration.

Under S. 42 of the Specific Relief Act, where any deed is executed by a Hindu widow, the result of which may be to prejudice the interests of the reversionary heirs, those heirs, though still reversionary and though they may never get any title because events may preclude them from doing so, may sue for a declaration as to the effect of the deed. And they are entitled to such a declaration notwithstanding that it involves a finding that they are reversionary heirs, because that must always be the case where a declaration is made following illustration (e) of the section.

The widow and daughter of a deceased Hindu executed a deed of gift purporting to convey the absolute estate in his property to a person who was admittedly a reversionary heir of the deceased. The plaintiffs, claiming to be reversionary heirs of the same degree as the donee, sued for a declaration that the deed was invalid and inoperative beyond the lifetime of the widow and the daughter. It was intended that the deed should operate to confer the whole interest on the donee on the footing that the plaintiffs were of the half-blood only, and could not come in, in competition with the grantee. The real question in the suit was, therefore, simply whether the plaintiffs were reversioners of the half-blood or of the whole-blood. The High Court, concurring with the court below, found that the plaintffs were reversioners of the full-blood and of the same degree as the donee, and

In respect of property held by M, a Hindu widow, as the mother and heir of her son, S, she executed a sale-deed, in which her daughter, and H, her grandson, the son of that daughter, joined. By the sale-deed, M conveyed her life-interest in the property, and her daughter and H purported to convey their future proprietary interest and right to possession after the death of M. After the death of M, H purchased the properties covered by the sale-deed from the nearest reversionary heirs of S. After the death of H, his sons sued to recover the properties from the alienees, alleging that the sale was not made for purposes which would make it binding on the reversioners. The High Court held that as H was a party to the sale, his sons were estopped from disputing its validity.

There was absolutely no evidence that the vendees were induced to alter their position in any respect in consequence of H's representation contained in the sale-deed. The circumstances of the case abundantly showed that in the whole transaction H must have been a mere passive instrument in the hands of his elders, and that his so-called statement could not have materially influenced either the vendor's or the vendee's conduct in the matter.

INTENDED ALIENATION—SUIT TO RESTRAIN.

——Dismissal for default of—Actual alienation subsequent—Suit to set aside—Not barred.

The dismissal, under S. 102 of C.P.C. of 1882, of a suit brought by the reversionary heirs of a deceased Hindu for a declaratory decree, and for an injunction restraining the deceased's widow from alienating property of the deceased then in her possession, is no bar, under S. 103 of C.P.C. of 1882, to a subsequent suit by them for a declaration that a deed of gift executed by her in respect of a portion of the property in favour of another was invalid and inoperative beyond her lifetime.

The cause of action in the prior suit was a threatened or intended alienation. The cause of action in the present suit is not mere matter of intention, but an alienation by way of gift actually made by the widow. The two grounds of action, even if they had both existed at the time of the prior suit, would have been different. In point of fact, the cause of action for the present suit did not exist at the time of the prior suit; and it is impossible to say that a cause of action, which did not exist at the time when the previous action was dismissed, can be regarded as other than a new cause of action subsequently arising (158). veyance is void pro tanto. He cannot set the deed aside, because it is partly valid ; nor can it affect the possession, which the widow has a right to keep or to give up to another. A suit by the presumptive reversioner for a declaration that the alienation by the widow does not affect his reversionary interest would seem to be, at least in many cases, the only practical mode of enforcing the heir's right to interfere with a widow's alienation. That such suits are known to the law is clear, for the Limitation Act of 1871 by Art. 124 prescribes the time for bringing a "suit during the life of a Hindu widow by a Hindu entitled to the possession of land on her death, to have an alienation made by the widow declared to be void except for her life." The person "entitled" must mean the presumptive heir who would be entitled if the widow died at that moment. A suit by a presumptive reversioner for a declaration that an alienation by the widow does not affect his reversionary interest is an exception to the rule that a Court shall not make a declaration except in cases in which the plaintiff could if he chose seek some consequential relief (156). A Hindu died leaving a widow and his mother but no male issue. The widow alienated portions of the estate of her husband. Plaintiff, claiming to be the reversionary heir of the deceased and to be entitled to succeed to his estate after the death of his mother, sued to recover possession of the property so alienated. To the suit the mother of the deceased and the alienees under the alienations in question were made parties. The mother died shortly after the institution of the suit. The Courts below found the alienations to be invalid beyond the lifetime of the widow, and, in view of the fact that the mother had died, passed a decree for possession in favour of the plaintiff.

In appeal to the Privy Council it was contended for the alienees that, as, at the time of the suit, the plaintiff was not entitled to possession, his suit, which was one for possession, ought to have been dismissed.

Held, over-ruling the contention, that, as, when the decree gave plaintiff possession, he was then entitled to possession, the objection resolved itself into one of form, not affecting the real merits of the case (193). (Sir James Colvile.) KOOER GOOLAB SING v. RAO KURUN SING.

The property at the death of H was in Company's paper ; and as long as it could remain in that security, the daughter permitted it so to remain ; but in the month of July, 1853, the Company paid off the loan in which it was invested. The daughter received the amount of the money, which was about Rs. 50,000, and before the Bill in the case was filed (on 15-8-1853), she had invested Rs. 39,000, of the money so received in other Company's paper; and she said, at the time when she put in her answer, in the month of October 1853, that was three months after the date when she received the money, that the remainder of the money was still in her hands uninvested, waiting for an eligible investment.

Held that no case had been made out for interference with the daughter's possession.

The 1st defendant was a daughter of the istimirar Zemindar, and was, as his heir, the Zemindar for the time being of an impartible estate. The second defendant was her son. The plaintiff was the son of a deceased daughter of the istimirar Zemindar, and claimed as the eldest of such grandsons to be entitled, by right of primogeniture, to succeed to the Zemindary as next heir after the death of the 1st defendant. The plaintiff instituted the suit, inter alia, to have a declaratory decree passed, establishing his right to succeed to the said Zemindary as next heir after the death of the 1st defendant. The plaint also raised a case of waste against 1st defendant, based upon certain dispositions of property made by her. The property alienated was not, however, specified, nor were the alienees, who were in possession, made parties to the suit.

The trial Judge held that the question of waste ought not to be tried in that suit, and declined to frame an additional issue raising the question. He was of opinion that the real object of the suit was to ascertain whether or not the plaintiff was the proper person to succeed to the Zemindary at the death of the 1st defendant, that, until he established his right as remainderman, he had no title either in possession or expectancy and was not in a position to question the validity of the alienations made by the 1st defendant, and that the question of alienation by the 1st defendant had no place in the suit.

———Maintainability—Plaintiff's right to succeed to estate doubtful.

The 1st defendant was the Zemindar of Shivagunga for the time being, she having taken it as the heir of her father next in succession to the widow. The second defendant was her son and claimed to be entitled to succeed to the Zemindary after the death of his mother. ———Reversionary character of plaintiff in—Declaration of, as against third party—Propriety.

A presumptive reversioner cannot by bringing a suit to restrain a widow or other Hindu female in possession from acts of waste get, as between him and a third party, an adjudication of title which he could not get without it (191).

The first defendant was a daughter of the istimirar Zemindar and was, as his heir, the Zemindar for the time being of an impartible estate. The second defendant was her son. The plaintiff was the son of a deceased daughter of the istimirar Zemindar, and claimed, as the eldest of such grandsons to be entitled by right of primogeniture, to succeed to the Zemindary as next heir after the death of the first defendant. The plaintiff instituted the suit, inter alia, to have a declaratory decree passed, establishing his right to succeed to the said Zemindary as next heir after the death of the first defendant. The plaint also raised a case of waste against the first defendant.

The trial Judge held that the question of waste ought not to be tried in the suit, and rejected an application made by the plaintiff for framing an additional issue on that point. His order was acquiesced in by the plaintiff, and was allowed by him to become final. The Courts below also held that the plaintiff had established no title to relief, and there was no appeal against that finding. The Courts below nevertheless made a decree declaring that as between the plaintiff and the second defendant the plaintiff was the next in succession to the suit Zemindary.

Held, reversing the Courts below, that, even if the plaintiff had proved acts of waste against the widow, which he had not done, that would not have given him a right as against the second defendant to have the question which arose between them determined by a declarator (192)

If the plaintiff had brought his suit to restrain the widow from acts of waste, he might, no doubt, have had to prove, not merely the acts of waste alleged, but a title sufficient to give him a locus standi in Court. Assuming that he would establish a sufficient locus standi against the widow, and the right to have her acts of waste restrained for the protection of the estate, that would not necessarily give him a right to bring the second defendant into Court in order to obtain a final adjudication of title against him (191-2). ———A suit by a reversioner to restrain a widow who has succeeded to the estate of her husband from committing acts of waste to the prejudice of those who might succeed to the inheritance on her death must be brought by the reversioner with that object, and for that purpose alone and the question to be discussed is solely between him and the widow. He cannot, by bringing such a suit, get as between him and a third party, an adjudication of title which he could not get without it. (Sir Lawrence Jenkins.) SHEOPARSAN SINGH v. RAMNANDAN SINGH.

———Reversionary character of plaintiff in—Declaration of, under prayer for "further relief"—Propriety—Waste—Substantive case of—Failure to make out.

R, a Hindu, died leaving no male issue but a widow and a mother (defendants 1 and 2) The former was entitled to a Hindu "widow's estate"; the latter was the person entitled to succeed should she survive the former. Only on the expiry of those lives would the estate descend to the next reversionary heir of the deceased. The respondent, as next reversioner, instituted a suit alleging acts of waste and misconduct on the part of the widow in relation to her deceased husband's estate. By his plaint, the respondent prayed for the appointment of a receiver and for an injunction restraining the widow from doing any act injurious to his reversionary interest. The third prayer of the plaint was for "granting such further relief as to the Court may seem fit and proper."

The Court below found against the charges of waste and mismanagement by the widow, and refused either to appoint a receiver or to grant an injunction. Nevertheless, the Sub Judge made an order "that plaintiff is declared to be the next reversionary heir of the deceased R after the lifetime of defendants Nos. 1 and 2" (his widow and mother). This was done under the third prayer for "further relief," and the declaration was made because of a dispute as to whether the plaintiff's relationship to the deceased had been made out. The form of the declaration was that the plaintiff was "the next reversionary heir." The High Court affirmed the declaration on appeal.

Held, that such a declaration was unavailing as well as premature, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to it (210-1).

Had waste of, or danger to, the estate been established, the title of the plaintiff to bring those matters before the Court in his representative capacity as a possible reversionary heir would have been allowed and a decree following upon the finding of fact of such waste or danger would have followed. But the whole of that part of the case has failed. The case must accordingly be treated as if the suit had been directed simpliciter to a declaration of the plaintiff's individual right. He was not entitled to such a declaration which would be unavailing as well as premature. It is not legitimate to give a plaintiff, under cover of a request for "further relief," after all the substantial heads of a claim have failed, greater right to obtain a declaration than he would have had if such a declaration had been asked directly, and the claim had been unaccompanied by other claims which proved unfounded (211). dent, alleging himself to be the next reversionary heir to the estate filed a suit contending that the will was invalid for the purpose of transferring the estate, and asking for a declaratory decree to that effect. The appellants by their written statement pleaded, inter alia, that I did not die intestate and that the 1st appellant was absolute owner of the estate under an oral will of her husband. The Courts below found the necessary issues in respondent's favour, and granted a declaratory decree as prayed.

On appeal their Lordships observed that if they had been sitting as a Court of first instance they would have felt no little hesitation before making the decree that had been made.

Their Lordships would guard against being thought to lay down that the execution of a will by a limited owner, such as a Hindu widow, as a general rule, affords a sufficient reason for granting a declaratory decree. After registration of the will of a deceased Hindu had been refused by the Registrar, persons claiming to be the nearest agnates of the deceased and as such to be entitled in reversion to succeed to the estate of the deceased after the termination of his widow's interest, instituted a suit for a declaration that they held the position of nearest agnates, and that the so called will was not executed in fact, and was, if executed, executed by the testator while in a condition of unsound mind. A counter-suit was brought by the persons setting up the will to have it declared that the will was genuine, and also to have the Registrar enjoined to register the will.

Held that, in such a case, what might be called the natural order would be first to take up the question of whether the parties who were attacking the will had any title to raise the question, because, unless they had such title, that is to say, unless they proved their relationship, they had no right to be heard, whether there was a will or not. ———Evidence of—Widow of last male owner—Admission of relationship by—Effect—Dispute between reversioner and alienee from widow.

The suit was by persons claiming to be the next-of-kin and heirs of the last male owner of the suit properties for the recovery of the same from the defendants and respondents who claimed title to the properties under a title claimed from P, the last male owner's widow, who had been recognised as proprietor of the properties at the settlement of 1847. The defendants denied that the plaintiffs were the heirs of the last male owner.

At the settlement of 1847 (it being uncertain whether P had an absolute estate or only a life interest in the property, though she claimed to be absolute owner) she was asked by the Settlement Officer who would be her heirs on her death. Her reply was :—"If the claimants' (plaintiffs' ancestors) " undertake to pay the debt which is due by me on account of revenue, or which may hereafter be due by me, and if they are obedient to me and I am thoroughly satisfied with them, they will be owners of my estate after my death ; but so long as I am alive I have every sort of power in respect of my estate"; and the estate was settled with her, the claimants accepting her conditions. In the record-of-rights showing the shares in the estate as prepared under Regulation IX of 1823 at the time of settlement P stated :—" As to the appointment of lambardar the claimants who are own brothers will become the owners of this estate in equal shares, provided they pay the present and future debts and remain obedient to me and one of them whom the Collector will think fit will be appointed lambardar."

The High Court declined to regard the above statement of P as an admission of relationship or recognition of the plaintiff's ancestors as her successors.

Held, that the High Court erred in so doing.

These proceedings at least show that the claim of kinship now put forward is not a recent innovation, but was made nearly fifty years before the commencement of the present suit, and was not then seriously controverted, if it was not in terms admitted. The whole proceeding is unintelligible on any other footing. P could not designate her successors or bind the reversion after her death. On the other hand, unless the brothers were assumed to be the then heirs of the last male owner, they had no interest in the matter. Whatever was said or done is not of course conclusive upon the respondents or perhaps standing alone, very strong evidence in favour of the appellants ; but it was a recognition on her part both that her husband's heirs (which is the character in which the three brothers claimed) were entitled to succeed her and also that she at any rate was not prepared to contest their claim to be such heirs. If the adoption was invalid, the appellant, if she survived her daughter-in-law, would become entitled on the death of the latter to her son's property.

———Maintainability of—Conditions.

Although a suit to set aside an adoption made by a Hindu widow may be brought by a contingent reversionary heir, yet, as a general rule, it must be brought by the presumptive reversionary heir, that is to say, by the person who would succeed if the widow were to die at that moment. Such a suit may be brought by a more distant reversioner if those nearer in succession are in collusion with the widow or have precluded themselves from interfering. It cannot be the law that any one who may have a possibility of succeeding on the death of the widow can maintain such a suit, for, if so, the right to sue would belong to every one in the line of succession, however remote. The right to sue must be limited. If the nearest reversionary heir refuses, without sufficient cause, to institute proceedings, or if he has precluded himself by his own act or conduct, from suing, or has colluded with the widow, or concurred in the act alleged to be wrongful, the next presumable reversioner would be entitled to sue (22-3). On objection taken in the Privy Council to the right of the plaintiff under the circumstances to maintain the suit the plaintiff for the first time contended in argument that the nearer reversioners, whose existence was admitted, had precluded themselves from suing to set aside the adoption.

A Hindu widow mortgaged her husband's estate by a deed executed in 1873. At that time, she had a daughter and a grand son by that daughter. The mortgage not being for necessity was invalid against the husband's estate. In a suit to enforce the same against the estate in the hands of the grandson, it was contended that the mortgage, even if originally invalid, was validated by another deed executed in 1877 by the widow, the daughter, and the grandson by which they admitted and recognised the deed of 1873. Held that the grandson had never been in a position to confirm the mortgage which was therefore not binding upon the estate in his hands (199).

The grandson has never had any present interest in the estate. On the date of the deed of 1877 relied upon for the validation of the mortgage, he was not even an heir-apparent; his mother was then heir-apparent. It is not contended that he ever took upon himself any personal responsibility for the loan, and it is clear that he has never been in a position to confirm the mortgage (199). One J, a distant relation of the last male owner, had attested the deed of alienation. The learned judges of the High Court upheld the alienation on the strength of the mere fact that J was an attesting witness, and must, therefore, be taken to have been a concurring party to the transaction.

It was not proved, though on the other hand it certainly was not disproved, that at the date of the execution of the deed of alienation, J was the next heir in reversion. He was unquestionably a very distant relation, and although he took a considerable part in the management of the family of the widow, he was not proved to have been the next heir. It further appeared that at the said time J knew that his interest, even if it existed, as next reversioner was, in all probability, likely to be defeated by an adoption made by the widow.

Held, under the circumstances, that J's concurrence, even if proved, would not amount to such a concurrence by the husband's kindred as would be sufficient to set up the deed of alienation or to defeat the plaintiff's claim (229-30). A reversioner in India may have a declaration from a court to the effect that a conveyance by the person presently in possession is only good for the life of that person and is not good as an absolute conveyance of the property against the reversioners. The right to bring such a suit is, however, limited, and, as a general rule, belongs to the presumptive reversionary heir. ———Suit for declaration of invalidity of—Maintainability—Nearer reversioner concurring in alienation.

The suit was by a reversioner to set aside alienations of the last male owner's property made by his deceased widow. The mother of the last male owner was alive at the date of, and was a party to, the suit. The defendants objected that the plaintiff, who was only a remote reversioner, was not competent to question the alienations and to sue to set them aside.

Held, overruling the contention, that, as the mother, the nearest reversioner at the time when the alienations took place, was charged as concurring in them, the next presumable reversioner, the plaintiff, was entitled to question them, and the pendency of her life was not a fatal objection to the institution of the suit (193). It has been held by a Full Bench of the High Court of Calcutta, that in the case of a succession by a reversionary heir after the death of a widow, who takes by inheritance from her husband, and is dispossessed, the period of limitation as against the reversionary heir, in the absence of fraud, is not to be reckoned from the time when he succeeds to the estate but from the time at which it would have been reckoned against the widow if she had lived and brought the suit (9 W. R. 505). The principle of that decision is correct (121).

———Law under later Limitation Acts.

A testator who died in 1869, leaving two widows, devised the whole residue of his estate to trustee for dharam. One widow died in 1871, and the other died in 1888. After the death of the second widow the heir of the testator sued for a declaration that the devise to dharam was void and for administration. The High Court held that the gift in dharam was invalid and there was an intestacy. The High Court further held that the possession of the trustees for dharam since the testator's death had been adverse as against the widows and the heir but that the plaintiff's claim to the immoveable property was not barred. It was also held that the plaintiff's claim to the moveable property was barred by limitation. On appeal to His Majesty in Council their Lordships held that Art. 141 of the Limitation Act of 1877 applied to the immovable property, and that under it time ran from the death of the second widow, and that, therefore, the plaintiff in the suit was not barred by limitation. It was also held that Art. 120 of the Limitation Act, 1877 applied to the moveable property, and that the right of the plaintiff in the suit to sue under that Article only accrued on the death of the second widow and was, therefore, also not barred. This case is, therefore, conclusive authority for the view that where there has been no decree against the widow or other act in the law in the widow's lifetime depriving the reversionary heir of the right to possession on the widow's death, the heir is entitled, after the widow's death, to rely upon Art. 141 for the purpose of the determination of the question whether the title is barred by lapse of time. ———Appellate decision upholding alienation on mere ground of—Propriety of—Validity of alienation rested in Court below on sole ground of necessity.

The nearest reversionary heir of a deceased Hindu sued to set aside an alienation of his estate made by his widow on the ground that it had not been made for justifiable purposes. The deed of alienation itself recited certain purposes for which the alienation was made, but no evidence was adduced by the alienee on that point (all he did being to produce the deed of alienation), and the trial Court held against the validity of the alienation, The deed of alienation had been attested by one J, a reversioner, but no point was made of that circumstance in the trial Court, and the plaintiff had no opportunity of examining J as to the circumstances under which he became an attesting witness, or what his understanding of the transaction really was. The point was taken on appeal to the High Court, and that Court reversed the Court below and upheld the alienation upon the mere proof, by the production of the deed of sale, that J was an attesting witness to it.

Held that the utmost that the High Court ought to have done in that state of things was to remand the case to be re-tried, for the full consideration of that question (228-9).

If anything could have been made of that point, it would have been rather a reason for a remand of the cause, to be tried upon such an issue, than for an immediate decision of the case against the plaintiff (230). A Hindu widow who had succeeded to an estate and other property absolutely owned by her husband sold the whole of the estate to her son-in-law by a number of sale-deeds executed at different dates, each in respect of a portion of the estate. A few years after the execution of those deeds, deeds of relinquishment for valuable consideration, ratifying the said sale-deeds and agreeing not to dispute their validity were executed by all the then nearest reversionary heirs, being the only living reversioners in the line of the common ancestor of themselves and the deceased owner of the estate. In a suit instituted after the death of the widow by the sons of the persons who executed the deeds of relinquishment and ratification for the recovery of the estate and other moveable property, held that the consent of the executants of the said deeds was sufficient, that it was immaterial that it was given after the execution of the sale-deeds and that the plaintiffs were bound by the consent of their fathers, through whom they claimed and could not dispute the vaiidity of the sale-deeds. At all events, there should be such a concurrence of the members of the family as suffices to raise a presumption that the transaction was a fair one, and one justified by Hindu law. That it can be a presumption of law in the sense of "presumptio juris et de jure" their Lordships do not think. It is, no doubt, an element to be taken into consideration, and deserving of considerable weight in the estimation of all the evidence of the transaction (228). (*Sir James W. EXECUTION OF DEED OF ALIENATION AS WIDOW'S MOOKHTAR—CONSENT BY REASON OF.

———Life interest of widow—Deed conveying only.

A Hindu widow, who had inherited the estate of her husband, gave a power of attorney to J, her husband's uncle and presumptive reversioner to his estate, authorising him to sell her husband's share on her behalf. Pursuant to the power J executed a sale-deed in respect of the said share, which sale-deed stated that the vendors (N, the mother of the deceased being also a party to the deed) " put the vendee in possession of the share sold instead of us, like ourselves" and that " the vendee has become an absolute owner of the share sold from the date of the sale." The deed was signed as follows :—" by wife, and N, mother, heirs of K " (the deceased) " by the pen of J, Sarbarakar and Mukhtar."

There was no evidence that J was benefited by the sale or that there was any inducement for him to concur in it so as to forego his reversionary right.

Held that the estate of the wife alone passed by the deed and that the reversionary interest was not affected by it.

It was not so clear that more than the beneficial interest of the widow in the property passed by the deed that J must be taken to have consented to its passing. (Sir Richard Couch.) JIVAN SINGH v. MISRI LAL.

It is not a case in which all the kindred of Khairati, the last male owner, assented or could assent to the mortgage bonds by the widow of Khairati, and the circumstances are not such as to raise any presumption from such concurrence as there was of Achhan Kunwar, the daughter of Khairati, and Enayet, her son, that the transaction was a fair one or one justified by Hindu law. In order to raise such a presumption the consent of the deceased's kindred to his widow's or daughter's alienation must be shown to be given with a knowledge of the effect of what they were doing, and an intelligent intention to consent to such effect (189). Reversioner—Widow—Alienation by—Different alienations—Suits different to set aside.

———Not barred under Or. 2, R. 2, C. P. C.

Plaintiffs, the reversionary heirs of a deceased Hindu, first brought a suit against various defendants to impeach certain alienations made by the widow and mother of the deceased. They were alienations by which the inheritance, subject to the interests of those persons, was transferred to certain foster-sons, or near relations, or defendants of the two ladies so as to exclude the remoter heirs. Plaintiff then brought another suit to set aside a mortgage which had been granted by those ladies to the respondent's ancestor before the alienations which were the subject of the prior suit. In the description of the property, which was the subject of the first suit, three of the villages forming part of that property were subject to the mortgage in question in the second suit, and the name of the mortgagee was mentioned. It appeared, however, that the causes of action in the two cases were essentially different; in the one case, the widow and mother, assuming an absolute power of disposition, had granted the inheritance in portions of the estate to the defendants in the first suit. In the other case, the issue was, whether they had duly exercised the limited power which belonged to a Hindu female having a Hindu female's right of inheritance in the estate, of charging the estate for certain definite purposes.

Held, reversing the Court below, that the second suit was not barred under S. 7 of C. P. C. of 1859 (197-9).

The object of the first suit was perfectly distinct from that which is the object of the second suit, which is to have these mortgages declared invalid as against the person who has in the former suit established his title to the possession of the estate as heir, on the ground that they were securities, which those who granted them had not the power to grant as incumbrances upon the inheritance (198). A Hindu widow, who had succeeded to the estate of her childless son, executed a deed of gift in favour of R, the then nearest reversionary heir, in respect of parts of such estate. R entered into possession, but died prior to 1896, and was succeeded by his two nephews, A being one of them. In 1896, the nephews executed a mortgage bond in favour of the appellant mortgaging 4/15ths share of Mitta K on the recital that they held 2/15ths in respect of the deed of gift executed by the widow.

The widow died in 1907, leaving the appellant, the respondent before the Privy Council, and A (who had died before the appeal to the Privy Council) as the reversionary heirs then entitled to the estate. In a suit brought immediately after the death of the widow by the appellant against A and the respondent for the recovery of, inter alia, 1/15 of Mitta K, held that by taking the mortgage the plaintiff could not be held to have elected to treat the deed by the widow as valid because (1) the deed comprised property to which the mortgagors were entitled in their own right and they were more than sufficient security for the mortgage amount, and (2) the plaintiff did not know at the time that he would ever become a reversioner entitled to question the validity of the deed (37). Held, that the effect of the parol evidence was to be considered in so far only as it determined the position of the parties at the time of the razinamah; and that the relation of the parties in the case was such, that a transaction between them should be closely scanned, and that a document obtained by the chief male member of a family from a purdah woman should receive a strict construction. DELAY IN INSTITUTING.

———Effect.

It is true that there has been considerable delay in the institution of this suit (by a reversioner to recover on the death of a Hindu widow the property of her husband alleged to have been improperly alienated by her), and this delay appears the greater because of the length of time that elapsed before the reversion fell in. But it is not usual for a reversioner to sue during the lifetime of the widow and in fact this suit is within time. The delay that has occurred since the widow's death has been reasonably explained as attributable to the pendency of another suit and the lack of means to meet the expenses of the litigation (722) —per High Court. DISMISSAL OF, ON GROUND OF EXISTENCE OF NEARER REVERSIONER—CUSTOM ENTITLING HIM TO SUCCEED EQUALLY WITH NEARER REVERSIONER—SUIT SUBSEQUENT BASED ON.

———Maintainability.

The appellants with others filed a suit against H, a Hindu widow, J, in whose favour H had executed a gift deed conveying her husband's property, and one G. The appellants alleged that they and G were the presumptive heirs of H's husband, and prayed for a declaration that the deed of gift executed by H in favour of J might be declared void and illegal against them. The defendants pleaded that the appellants were not equal in degree with G, and that G was the nearest reversioner and the only person entitled to dispute the deed of gift. To that the appellants replied by saying that, if G were the nearer heir, he had precluded himself from suing.

In that state of the pleadings H died. Thereupon the appellants made an application in the suit setting forth the death of the widow and claiming that they had become entitled to institute a suit for possession, and that in order to show their right it had become necessary to mention certain additional averments of fact in the plaint. The additional averments they wanted to make were (1) allegation of a family custom by which the appellants were in equal degree with G and were entitled to succeed equally with him and (2) a statement as to the death of the widow H. The new relief they sought to claim was a decree for possession of a ten anna share in the property. The application to amend the plaint by adding the allegations averring the family custom was rejected on the ground that it was an attempt to introduce a new case. The appellants admitted that, apart from custom, they were one degree more remote than G,and that, if they could not make the case of a family custom, their suit must fail. Their suit was accordingly dismissed with costs and that dismissal was allowed to become final.

In a suit subsequently brought by the appellants against J and the representative in interest of G for possession of one half of the property covered by the said deed of gift, founding their title on family custom, held that the claim based on the family custom was barred under S. 11, Expl. IV of C. P. C. of 1908.

When the appellants brought their first suit they had to show their title to impeach the widow's gift. For this purpose they had to show either that they were some at least of the nearest reversionary heirs, or that the only nearer reversionary heir had colluded with the widow. In their plaint they did not rely on collusion which they only introduced in their replication. Taking, however, that view of the pleadings which is most favourable to them and treating them as relying equally on both grounds of claim, it is now clear that they can only make out a claim to be some of the next reversioners on the footing of the family custom, and that the allegation of that custom therefore was an allegation which "might and ought to have been made" within the meaning of Expl. IV. Or, to put it in another way. One of the alternative cases on which they were basing their title to sue was their nearness of kin, and to prove their neareness of kin it was essential to aver the family custom. They claimed as next heirs, and their claim was dismissed. They cannot fight it over again (105.) (Lord Phillimore.) FATEH SINGH v. JAGANNATH BAKSH SINGH.

LIMITATION LAW APPLICABLE TO

———Law in force at date of suit—Law in force when right accrued—Suit not barred under latter not barred by reason of former.

The suit, which was instituted in September 1858. was brought by the plaintiff, the only son of a daughter of R, to recover R's property. R died in 1824. without a son, leaving a widow and three daughters. The widow died in March 1835. It was found that the possession of R's estate by the defendants, who represented R's brothers, was not adverse to R's widow. but that limitation began to run against the plaintiff's mother, and that neither she nor the plaintiff ever had possession of any portion of his maternal granfather's estate or of the rents or income thereof.

Held, that the period of limitation must be calculated according to the old law (the law prior to Act XIV of 1859), and that under that law the periods during which the plaintiff and his mother were respectively under the disability of minority must be deducted (123). MORTGAGE VALID BY WIDOW—DEFENDANT MORTGAGEE UNDER—DECREE PROPER IN CASE OF.

———Dismissal of suit without prejudice to plaintiff's right to redeem mortgage.

In a suit by the Crown claiming by escheat to recover possession of the property of a deceased Hindu after the death of his widow, it was found that there was due from the widow to the father of the appellant in respect of advances for which she would have been entitled to alienate the estate, as against the next heirs of her husband, if such there had been, the sum of Rs. 48,000 odd, that that sum was duly charged upon the estate by a mortgage bond executed by the widow in favour of the appellant ; and that the appellant was entitled to a declaration to the above effect and to the effect that he was entitled to hold the suit property against the Crown as a security for so much of the said sum and of the interest thereon as remained unpaid

Held, that the above declaration was fatal to the Crown's claim to immediate possession of the suit property, but that it would leave an equity of redemption in the Crown, and that in strictness, therefore, the Crown's suit should stand dismissed, without prejudice to the right of the Crown (if it should so think fit) to assert its equity of redemption in a suit properly framed for that purpose (636, 638). forma, as being members of the family, though they advanced no claims. The case was not one of the joint property of a Hindu family. If the case were proved, some one person or some few, standing in the same degree of genealogical propinquity, would alone succeed, but the scheme of the action was to bring into court a large number of persons, more or less remotely akin in blood, in the hope of ousting the defendants by a mass attack, and afterwards to assign the fruits of victory to the parties entitled by further litigation inter se.

Held, that such a joinder of parties was objectionable.

Such a plan is inconvenient and is much to be condemned. It is not a mere question of swollen expenses, which might be cured by an order to pay costs thrown away. ———Defendant's title—Weakness of, immaterial.

The plaintiffs-respondents were the reversionary heirs of a deceased Hindu. They alleged that as such heirs they were entitled to succeed to the properties, moveable and immoveable, of the deceased on the death of his widow. The appellant was the brother's daughter of the widow. She claimed title to the suit properties under a deed of gift executed by the widow in her favour. She contended that the plaintiffs-respondents were not in any event entitled to succeed to the suit properties on the death of the widow. The plaintiffs, therefore, instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose with the object (1) of being confirmed in the possession of the various parcels of immoveable property which were specified in the plaint, (2) of recovering certain moveable property which was under attachment, (3) of having the deed of gift set up by the appellant cancelled and set aside; and (4) of avoiding the title which the appellant was then understood to claim by virtue of an alleged adoption by the widow of the last male owner.

Held that, in view of the nature and object of the suit, a finding that the deed of gift set up by the appellant had not been established would not determine the cause and that the respondents must still show a title to the relief which they claimed (169-70.)

The appeal arose out of a suit instituted by the plaintiffs for a declaration that they were the next reversioners to the estate of one B, deceased, and as such were entitled to apply to the Probate Court to get the probate of an alleged will of B, granted to one R, revoked.

It appeared that, on the application of R, for grant of probate of the said will of B, caveats were lodged by, inter alia, the plaintiff; that, after contest and evidence taken, it was held in the probate proceedings that the plaintiffs had failed to prove their interest to oppose the application for probate, and that the will was proved; and that probate was accordingly ordered to be given to R.

Held, that B's, will having been affirmed in a court exercising appropriate jurisdiction, the propriety of that decision could not be impugned by a court exercising any other jurisdiction; and that, while that will stood, the plaintiffs were not clothed with a legal character or title which would authorise them to ask for the declaratory decree sought by their plaint (97-8). riage, the sister's husband went to live in his wife's village. He died leaving the appellant, a minor about four year's old, his son and sole heir to the property which he had inherited from his father. After his death, mother and child (appellant) went to live with the child's uncles. From that time onwards the uncles treated the minor's property in the same way as their own family property; they cultivated it and treated the produce as joint property. The position remained unchanged even after the appellant attained his majority; individual members adventured, the proceeds going to a common fund. About 5 years after the appellant attained his majority, the half interest of his paternal uncle in the ancestral property was purchased from that uncle's son, the purchase price being paid for out of the common fund, the sale deed being, however, taken in the name of the appellant.

In a suit for partition brought by the plaintiff, held

(1) that the onus was on the plaintiff to establish that the property which the appellant had as a minor inherited from his father was partible and he had an interest in it, and that he had not discharged that onus; and (2) that, with regard to the share subsequently purchased, any presumption as to the joint nature of the purchase which might arise from the joint nature of the funds which went for the purchase was sufficiently rebutted by the fact that during the appellant's minority the rest of the family had undoubtedly received proportionately greater advantage from the appellant's separate property, and the evidence that they desired to recognise that by acquiring the second half for the appellant himself.

The case is not one of an original member of a Hindu family becoming a convert, but electing to retain his interest in the family property on the old footing. Here a definite cession to a Hindu family of property which originally did not belong to the family by a non-member of the family who was a Christian has to be proved. The validity of the adoption was contested on the ground that, as L survived his father and attained the age of ceremonial competence, there was no occasion or justification for any adoption.

There was no proof that L had attained ceremonial competence in fact, or that he ever acted or was treated as having attained it. The Sub-Judge, himself a learned Hindu, considered it to be clear that L had not attained such competence, as he died a minor and unmarried, and the High Court came to the same conclusion.

Mr. Forsyth, indeed, argued strongly against the right of the appellant (the maternal uncle of the father of the deceased) to inherit, on the assumption that he was not entitled to offer the funeral oblations. But is this assumption well founded ? There is evidence, the uncontradicted evidence of the family priest and others, that the appellant did, in point of fact, perform the sraddh of the deceased, and he seems, in the judgment of the priest, properly to have performed that function in the absence of any nearer kinsman. It is, however, unnecessary to determine whether the act of the appellant was regular or not. The issue in this case is not between two competing kinsmen, but between a kinsman of the deceased and the Crown (462). (*Sir James W. WHAT IS.

———Different views as to.

During the voluminous discussions, ancient and modern, which have arisen with regard to the separate property of women under Hindu law, its qualities, its kinds, and its lines of descent, the question has constantly been found in the forefront, what is stridhan? The Bengal School of lawyers have always limited the use of the term narrowly, applying it exclusively, or nearly exclusively, to the kinds of woman's property enumerated in the primitive sacred texts. The author of the Mithakshara and some other authors seem to apply the term broadly to every kind of property which a woman can possess, from whatever source it may be derived. Their Lordships do not propose to dwell upon this particular question. It may perhaps be regarded as one mainly of phraseology, not necessarily Involving, however it be answered, much distinction in the substance of the law (205-6). According to the principles of Hindu law, there is coparcenaryship between the different members of a united family, and survivorship following upon it. There is community of nterest and unity of possession between all the members of the family, and upon the death of any one of them the others may well take by survivorship that in which they had during the deceased's lifetime a common interest and a common possession. But the law of partition shows that as to the separately acquired property of one member of a united family, the other members of that family have neither community of interest nor unity of possession. The foundation, therefore, of a right to take such property by survivorship fails, and there are no grounds for postponing the widow's right to any superior right of the coparceners in the undivided property (611). ———Partition—Rights of—Connection between.

The theory which would restrict the preference of the co-parceners over the widows to partible property is not only founded upon an intelligible principle, but reconciles the law of inheritance with the law of partition. These laws are so intimately connected that they may almost be said to be blended together; and it is surely not consistent with this position that co-parceners should take separate property by descent, when they take no interest in it upon partition (611-2). ———Trust estate—Creation by will of—Validity.

It was argued that the will is void by reason of its being founded upon the creation of an estate in trustees, absorbing the whole interest in the property, and out of which the interests of the beneficiaries are to be fed. It was maintained that an estate, to be held in trust, can have no existence by the Hindu law, and that, as the foundation of the will fails, the whole superstructure must fall (70-1).

Their Lordships are unable to give any effect to this argument against the admissibility of a trust. It is obvious that property, whether moveable or immoveable, must for many purposes be vested, more or less absolutely, in some person or persons for the benefit of other persons, and trusts of various kinds have been recognised and acted upon in India in many cases (71).

Implied trusts were recognised and established by this Board in the case of a benamee purchase; and in cases of a provision for charity or for other beneficent objects, such as the professorship provided for by the will under consideration, where no estate is conferred upon the beneficiaries and their interest is in the proceeds of the property the creation of a trust is particularly necessary (71-2).

Hence the argument that there cannot be a trust estate is not tenable (72). (Mr. Justice Willes.) JUTTENDROMOHUN TAGORE v. GANENDRO MOHUN TAGORE. (1872) Sup. I. A. 47 = 9 B. L. R. 377 = 18 W. R. 359 = 3 Sar. 82 = 2 Suth. 692.

———Adopted son of husband—Person put forward and treated by widow as, but whose adoption was subsequently held to be invalid—Will by widow giving whole property to.

N, who died without male issue, had inherited some property and had purchased some. On his death, his widow, who succeeded to his estate, had purchased a good deal of property, consisting, amongst others, of houses and lands. The widow left by will all the property which she had power to dispose of to one P.

P claimed to be the adopted son of N. In a suit brought by a person claiming to be the reversionary heir of N and to be entitled to succeed to the property of N on the death of his widow in default of the adoption of P, the Privy Council ultimately held, however, that P was not the adopted son of N, and declared the right of the plaintiff therein on the death of the widow of N to succeed to his property. The Privy Council remitted the cause to the High Court to make the necessary inquiries to ascertain, inter alia, what part of the property claimed by the plaint was the estate of N. In the course of that inquiry the question arose whether the houses and lands purchased by the widow of N formed part of his estate. It was found as a fact that the said properties were purchased by the widow out of the proceeds of her husband's estate. It was nevertheless contended that they did not form increments to the husband's estate, but belonged to the widow absolutely, and were at her absolute disposal, because she had evinced an intention to sever them from the husband's estate, and to treat them as made in her own right.

Held, on the facts, that the intention of the widow was, not to sever the purchases from her husband's estate and to treat them as acquired in her own right, but to treat them as increments to her husband's estate, and that they, therefore, formed part of N's estate.

In the present case their Lordships are of opinion that the widow, who always maintained the validity of P's adoption as heir to her deceased husband and treated him as entitled to succeed to her husband's property, must be presumed to have intended to make her purchases as accretions to that property; nor do they see any evidence to rebut this presumption. It is true that she made a will in her son's favour, but it contains no specific gift of the property in question, and might well have been intended to apply to any property of her own which may have belonged to her as her Stridhan. That the property in question was understood by P himself to be part of N's estate is shown by the pleadings in the original suit (in which his adoption was declared invalid), in which he claimed it as the adopted son and heir of N (372). EVIDENCE AS TO—(Contd.)

Held, on the facts, that the High Court was right in deciding that the purchased properties were accretions to the husband's property.

There are circumstances here which would indicate that it was the intention of the widows to keep the estate entire and that they did not intend that the husband's estate and the subsequently purchased properties should go in a different line of succession, because their act, in what they did with regard to the defendant, was to make a gift to him of the whole of the property and professing to do it so as to, what seems to be called, carry out the intentions of the husband and found a thakoorbari, with which the estate would be connected. The transaction appears to indicate that their intention was not to create separate estates, one to go in one way, and another in another, but to keep the whole as one entire property; and applying what is said in the case of Isridut Koer to the present case, there do not appear to be circumstances which would shew that there was any other intention than that the purchased property should be accretions to the inherited property (66). ———Lands in which husband was share-holder to a larger extent—Shares of—Accumulations consisting of—No distinction made between original estate and after-purchases—Conveyance of parts of both to same person.

B, a Hindu, died leaving two widows and D, a daughter by one of them. On 21-12-1873, the widows executed a deed whereby, after stating that with the exception of D, there was no heir of the husband or of themselves, they made a gift to her of certain lands and villages, only retaining to themselves a life interest in part of them. Some of the property was described as mowzahs exclusively acquired by the widows out of their own fund, and the rest was described as having been left by their husband B.

D, died in 1875, and, in 1876, the plaintiffs brought a suit for a decision that the deed of December 1873 was null and void as regards the reversionary interests of the plaintiffs, and for a declaration that the properties acquired by the widows were part and parcel of their husband's estate.

The properties acquired by the widows were found to have been purchased by them out of the profits of their husband's estate, and the question arose whether they were accretions to that estate.

Held, reversing the High Court, and restoring the Sub-Judge, that the after-purchases were accretions to the original estate, and that they were inalienable by the widows for any purpose which would not justify alienation of that original estate (161).

In this case the properties in question consist of shares of lands in which the husband was a share-holder to a larger extent. They were purchased within a short time after his death in 1857. No attempt to alienate them was made till 1873. The object of the alienation was not the need or the personal benefit of the widows, but a desire to change the succession, and to give the inheritance to the heirs of one of themselves in preference to their husband's heirs. Neither with respect to this object, nor apparently in any other way, have the widows made any distinction between the original estate and the after-purchases. Parts of both are conveyed to D, immediately, and parts of both are retained by the widows for life. These are circumstances which, in their Lordships' opinion, clearly establish accretion to the original estate, and make the after-purchases inalienable by the widows for any purposes which would not justify alienation of that original estate (161). Where, owing to difficulties which had arisen in connection with the occupiers of her husband's estate, a Hindu widow bought their tenant rights in part by the release of the arrears of rent due by them and in part by a payment of cash from out of the accumulated savings from the income of her husband's estate, held, that the tenant rights so acquired would be an obvious accretion to the husband's property which, if it were possible for her to segregate, would require an unequivocal act for the purpose.

Where the deed by which the widow purported to sell property so acquired recited the necessities of debts and the costs of litigation as a justification for the sale, held further, that the recitals afforded strong evidence of the fact that the widow knew that the property dealt with by her was her husband's property. INCOME OF ESTATE TO WHICH ALONE WIDOW ENTITLED IF.

———Corpus taken by another under husband's will—Investment of income by widow in Government securities—Effect.

The will of a deceased Hindu did not specifically dispose of the income of the estate for a period of 8 years from the date of the testator's death. The widow of the testator maintained that it was intestate succession falling to her as her husband's widow and heiress. S, the brother of the testator, and the person to whom the general estate, real and personal of the testator, was disposed of by the will and who had the entire administration of the testator's estate for the said period of 8 years, originally contested the widow's claim to the said income. Afterwards he, however, conceded her claim, and an agreement was entered into between him and the widow by which she received a sum of Rs. 2,89,000 from S and relinquished her claim to the said income. That sum she received as income of her husband's estate to which she, as his widow and heiress, was absolutely entitled. By the same deed of argeement she relinquished other claims also on payments made by S in satisfaction thereof. The several sums payable and paid under that deed amounted in the aggregate to Rs. 4,75,450, and the payment was made in currency notes of various amounts.

Out of the sum of Rs. 2,89,000 of accumulated income the widow paid away about Rs. 20,502 for law and other costs, and with the balance, as well as with the other sums above-mentioned received from her brother-in-law, she purchased Indian Government promissory notes yielding interest payable half-yearly. She survived for about 20 years after the date of the agreement, and, a few months before her death, she executed a deed of settlement and trust, by which she transferred to the Administrator-General of Bengal as trustee the securities in which she had invested the sum received as the eight years of accumulated income from her husband's estate, after deducting costs and charges and also other Indian Government Promissory Notes for Rs. 10,600, being part of the interest which had accrued on the securities originally bought, which had not been spent by her in the meantime. The purposes of the trust were generally the payment to herself or for her use of the interest or dividends of the securities during her life, and after her death a provision that the securities should be held in trust for G, her grandson, and his heirs and assigns, for his and their absolute use and benefit.

Held, affirming the Courts below, that, assuming that the savings of a Hindu widow must be presumed to have been made for the benefit of her husband's estate, there was no room for any such presumption in the circumstances of the case, that the widow had never indicated any intention to make the eight years' income received by her part of her husband's estate for the benefit of his heirs, and that she had therefore absolute power to alienate and dispose of the securities in question (23-5).

The corpus of the estate never came to the widow, but was taken by S under the will, and the income to which the widow succeeded was separated from it, and became and was dealt with as an entirely separate fund. To use the words of Mr. Justice Trevelyan in reference to the widows' position: "There was no estate of her husband's in her hands for her to augment." She did nothing to indicate an intention to make the fund received, or the interest on it, part of her husband's estate which was in other hands, or to justify the inference that she wished it to revert to her husband's heirs. Having received the money in currency notes which yielded no return and the keeping of which was attended with much risk, she at once placed it, as any prudent person would do, in securities, investing it in Government promissory notes yielding regular interest but which were negotiable instruments transmissible by mere indorsation. It is important also to observe that the other funds which she received from S were invested precisely in the same way and at the same time, and that for purposes of investment, therefore, the fund in dispute was not kept separate, but was mingled with her general personal means, and she seems to have used the interest and income of the whole indiscriminately for her maintenance, and spent the greater part of it. It may be further mentioned that, while her trust settlement, by which she conveyed the income in question, was executed in 1886, this deed superseded an earlier testamentary deed of 1882, which she cancelled in 1886, in which she distinctly records her view that she had received the fund as her absolute property, and had placed it in Government securities "for my own absolute benefit, and without any intention or desire to make the same or any part thereof accumulations to the estate of the said N, "(her husband)" but on the contrary, with the full intention of having, retaining and exercising full and uncontrolled dominion by will, deed, or otherwise over the same and every part thereof" (23-4). LAW AS TO.

———It has been argued that, assuming the purchases to have been made by the widow out of the proceeds of her husband's estate, nevertheless, they do not form increments to that estate, but belong to the widow absolutely and are at her absolute disposal, either by gift in her lifetime or by will. The principal authority relied upon in support of that contention is 9 M. I. A. 123. That case cannot, however, be regarded as a conclusion, or even a direct authority upon the question. (Sir Robert P. Collier.) GONDA KOOER v. KOOER OODEY SINGH. (1874) 14 B. L. R. 159 = 3 Sar. 370 = 2 Suth. 975.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

———Test.

In deciding the question whether purchases made by a Hindu widow in possession of her husband's estate as his heir out of the profits of such estate are accretions to the husband's estate, the difficulty is enhanced, if not created, by the later current of decision, which gives to the widow a more free and complete usufruct of her husband's property than is accorded to her by the texts and earlier decisions (157-8).

The question was agreed at the bar as though it were necessary to divide all the property of a widow into two classes; one being her stridhan, and the other her husband's estate over which she has the widow's right and no more. But the very question is, whether, having regard to the widow's freedom in enjoying her husband's property, and to her established right to alienate her own interest in it, she has not a kind of property the nature of which must remain undecided till her disposal of it or her death. It is impossible to read Mr. Justice Ainslie's forcible argument, without feeling that it is difficult to specify the point of time at which the widow loses her control over the unexpended portion of her income from her husband's estate. If she may spend or give away the whole, may she not put some by? If she saves one year or month, may she not spend those savings the next year or month? If she may save and spend again, may she not place her savings so as to get some income from them? And so on through all the steps of the sorites (158).

The cases shewing that a widow's savings from her husband's estate are not her stridhan are not authorities on this question. If she has made no attempt to dispose of them in her lifetime, there is no dispute but that they follow the estate from which they arose. The dispute arises when the widow, who might have spent the income as it accrued, has in fact saved it and afterwards attempts to alienate it (158).

After a review of the authorities on the point, their Lordships observed: This is the state of the authorities, and their Lordships think it must be taken as adverse to the claim made on behalf of the widow. It is not possible to lay down any sharp definition of the time which separates accretions to the husband's estate from income held in suspense in the hands of the widow, as to which she has not determined whether or no she will spend it. As before said, they feel the force of Mr. Justice Ainslie's reasoning on this point (160-1). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse.) ISRI DUT KOER v. MUSSUMUT HANSBUTTI KOERAIN.

In a case in which, under a deed executed by a Hindu in favour of his wife, an estate for life was given to her, with a power to appropriate the profits, and a vested remainder on her death was given to his adopted son, held that the wife would have the power of making whatever use she chose of the proceeds of her estates; and that if she bought land or personal property with them, that land and that property would be hers, and would devolve on the person who represented her (259-60, 262). QUESTION AS TO—PRIVY COUNCIL APPEAL—PERMISSIBILITY FOR FIRST TIME IN.

A Hindu widow, who had sued for the recovery of arrears of annuity payable to her husband under an agreement, died during the pendency of the suit. Shortly afterwards the next reversioner sold his rights including the widow's claim to the arrears of allowances to a person who applied, on the strength of the said assignment, to be brought on record as legal representative in place of the widow. The defendant, though he raised several objections to the assignee being brought on record, did not urge that the assignment was ineffectual to convey title as regards the arrears of annuity because they were the absolute property of the widow and that as regards such arrears the widow's separate heirs were the proper representatives and not the assignee. The first court gave, a decree for the said arrears in favour of the assignee. The objection was not taken even in the appeal to the High Court. On objection taken before their Lordships, held that, as it was a question of fact to be determined on the evidence as to whether the arrears did or did not form an accretion, it could not be allowed to be raised at that stage. ———Original estate and after—purchases—Distinction between, whether made by widow.

According to the case of Isridut Koer (L.R. 10 I.A. 150), the matter which has to be looked at in deciding whether the property acquired or purchased by the widows is to descend with the husband's estate, or is to be treated as a separate estate is whether the widows made any distinction between the original estate and the after purchases (65-6). Held, the step-mother was merely a trespasser upon the estate, and if she trespassed upon the estate and received the mesne profits, it is not clear that a Court of Equity would ear-mark those mesne profits, and say that because the mesne profits must have been expended in the purchase of the property in question it necessarily passed with the estate (179-80).

It is not the case of a widow inheriting and purchasing property out of the assets of the estate which she takes as widow, for those have been considered by law as an augmentation of the estate; but this is the case of a step-mother who was not entitled to succeed to the estate, and who, if she disposed of any portion of the rents and profits, was disposing of them as profits which she had received as a trespasser (180). Nothing could be more natural or consistent with the usage of Hindu families than that upon her husband's death a Hindu widow should continue to reside at the family dwelling-house as a member of the joint family. from her husband, unless it could be distinctly shewn that she received only maintenance as distinguished from a participation in the profits of the estate; for, even if she did not receive her full share of the profits, limitation would not run against her in the same manner as if she had been actually dispossessed of her husband's share of the estate (122-3).

R, a Hindu, governed by the Bengal Mithakshara law, died withont a son, leaving a widow and three daughters. The evidence was to the effect that, after R's death, his widow continued to live with her deceased husband's brothers and was supported by them out of the incomc of the estate. Indeed, the defendants, who represented R's brothers, themselves stated that the brothers retained R's wife and unmarried daughter under their own support and guidance, and that they effected the marriage of the unmarried daughter into a suitable family, and in a proper manner.

———M, a Hindu, died in 1859, leaving a widow, J, and a son, P. P died in 1861, leaving a widow, the appellant, L.

After the death of M, J took possession of the suit property which belonged to him and remained in possession of it up to the time of her death, which took place in 1887. It was not, however, clear upon the evidence whether J got possession during the lifetime of her son P or on his death. In or before 1875 L brought a suit against J to recover possession of the property in dispute and of other property. That suit was ultimately dismissed on the ground that it was barred by the law of limitation.

In a suit brought after the death of J for the recovery of the same property from persons who claimed it under a will and a deed of gift of J, the question was in what capacity J took possession of the property as stated above, whether she took possession of the property claiming an absolute title therein, or whether she took possession asserting a title as a widow.

There was no direct evidence of any statement by J at the time she took possession, or subsequently, that she took it as a Hindu widow; but it was sought to be inferred from various documents and statements that she must have taken it in that capacity. The court below held on the evidence that J treated the estate always as being her own absolute property, and that the estate she held was that of an absolute full proprietor, and not the limited estate of a Hindu widow.

The appeal arose out of a suit brought by the appellants on the 10th August, 1888, to recover possession of an eight and three-quarter annas share of an estate originally owned by one B. The appellants were the great grandsons of B, that is B's daughter's son's sons.

The estate devolved, on the death of B, on his two sons K & T. Of these K died first, and thereupon T succeeded to the whole estate. T himself died in 1833, leaving his sonless widow N, the widow of B, and D the widow of K.

On the death of T, his widow inherited for her widow's estate the property which had been in her husband's sole possession. By an ikrarnama, dated 27th December, 1833, T's widow and D agreed that they should hold jointly the property which had come down from B. In the following year the two widows entered into an arrangement with N, carried out by ikrarnamas, executed on the 13th March, 1834, to the effect that she would have a four-annas share of the property which the widows had dealt with in the ikrarnama of 27th December, 1833. T's widow died in 1843, and thereafter by arrangement between D & N, the property was held in the proportion of eight and three-quarter annas by D, and seven and a quarter annas by N. The eight and three-quarter annas share thus got by D she transferred to her own brother R, who died in 1863. The defendants in the suit were the daughter and the widow of R.

The appellants, having obtained possession of the seven and one-quarter annas share got by N as aforesaid, sued for the recovery of the eight and three-qurter annas share in the possession of the defendants.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the possession of the suit property had been adverse since the year 1843, the date of the death of T's widow, and that the suit was therefore barred by limitation. (Lord Macnaghten,) MAHABIR PERSHAD v. ADHIKARI KOER. (1896) 23 C. 942 = 7 Sar. 58.

A Hindu widow, who held an Oudh estate as the heir of her husband, made, with the consent of the next reversioners, an absolute transfer of the estate by way of gift to A, and put him in possession. A sued for a declaration of his title as proprietor. The widow, the next reversioners to the estate, and the respondent, who had successfully opposed an application for mutation of names by A, were made defendants to the suit. The respondent claimed title to the suit estate under an alleged will of the last male owner.

The widow and the next reversioners supported the title of the respondent. The first Court found against the title of the respondent based on the alleged will and decreed the suit. The respondent appealed against that decree, making the widow and A alone parties to the appeal. The widow died pending the appeal, and the next reversioners brought themselves on record as parties to the appeal in her place, and supported the gift in favour of A. At the hearing of the appeal, the respondent admitted the correctness of the findings of the Court below as to (1) the will set up by himself, and (2) the execution of the deed of gift in favour of A, and confined his appeal to the question of the validity of the gift in favour of A, his contention being that it was beyond the powers of the widow as a Hindu widow holding the estate of her husband. The appellate Court upheld the respondent's contention, and dismissed the suit.

Held that the Court below ought, after the concessions made by the respondent, to have held that the respondent had no locus standi to contest the declaration of title which A had obtained from the first Court, and that his appeal to that Court ought to have been dismissed.

The respondent was, after the admission made by him that the finding of the first Court as to the title set up by him was correct, a mere impertinent intervenor in another person's affair, because he was not, in face of that finding, even remotely concerned in the title to the suit estate and in the right to the proprietary possession thereof, and he had no title to protect and no interest which could give him a right to contest the declaration of title of the Court below in favour of A.

If the suit had been one in ejectment by A, the respondent would have had a right to contest the correctness of the declaration of title of the Court below in favour of A. ———Validity—Interest conveyed under, entire property or widow's estate only.

Drigpal and Din Dayal were two out of 5 brothers who were at one time all members of a joint Hindu family. Din Dayal was adopted by his uncle and went out of the family. Another brother died without male issue. That left Duli Chand, Drigpal, and Kanhaya. Those three brothers separated in estate in the year 1876. Din Dayal died on 8th March, 1878, leaving no issue, but leaving surviving him his widow, R, and two widows of his adoptive father.

Din Dayal, though he made no legal will, expressed his last wishes as to the disposal of his estate. They were that after his death, his three surviving brothers should, as proprietors, enter upon possession of all his properties, and that they should make certain payments to his own widow, R, to his father's widows, and to certain other named persons. All parties were desirous that those wishes should be carried into effect, and accordingly a series of documents were executed, the first of which was an ekrarnama, dated the 3rd April, 1878, and executed by R, whereby she purported to dispose of all the property of her deceased husband in favour of the three brothers. The brothers carried out the wishes of the deceased with regard to the payments to his widow, etc., and entered into possession of the estate.

The question was whether the ekrarnama of the 3rd April, 1878, executed by R in favour of the three brothers was inoperative to pass more than her life interest, and whether the brothers who survived her must be deemed to have taken the property by inheritance, and not to have taken it by purchase.

The Sub-judge held that in the circumstances of the case the widow R could effect a valid alienation of the estate; the High Court held that she could not.

Their Lordships did not decide the question, though they observed that the obvious intention of the deed was to pass the whole property (739). (Sir Walter Phillimore.) RADHAKANT LAL v. NAZMA BEGUM.

LITIGATION FOR PRESERVATION OF ESTATE.

——Costs of—Alienation for.

A decree was obtained against a Hindu daughter, who had succeeded to her father's estate on the death of her mother, on foot of a money bond executed by the mother for money advanced to her for family purposes including the costs of litigation which was eventually successful in preserving the estate of the father. In satisfaction of that decree, the daughter assigned certain villages absolutely to the creditor.

Held, that the bond debt being one which, according to Hindu law, the daughter was justified in paying, her sons (the plaintiffs) were bound by the assignment of the villages by their mother to satisfy the decree obtained on the bond debt (147).

The preservation of the estate and the costs of litigation for that purpose are objects which justify a widow in incurring debt, and alienating a sufficient amount of the property to discharge it (147). (Sir Andrew Scoble.) KARIM-UD-DIN v. GOBIND KRISHNA NARAIN.

NECESSITY FOR.

——Admission of, by daughter and son-in-law—Admissibility in evidence of, against daughter's sons.

In a suit brought by the daughters' sons of the last male owner after his (the last owner's) widow's death for the recovery of the properties of the last owner alleged to have been improperly alienated by her, the question was whether the alienation by her was for necessity. The trial Judge admitted in evidence an affidavit made by the mothers and the fathers of the plaintiffs and containing a statement to the effect that the last male owner died leaving some debts due from him. The affidavit was filed in a prior suit brought against the widow of the last male owner, and was admitted by the trial Judge as an admission, "regarding the parents as the guardians of the plaintiffs and so capable of making admissions against their interests in their behalf."

The appellate Court held, that the affidavit was not admissible in evidence against the plaintiffs and their Lordships affirmed the judgment of the appellate Court.

The relevance of an admission must be determined by reference to the terms of the Evidence Act, and there is nothing in the Act which supports the view of the trial Judge. The plaintiffs in no sense derive their interest in the subject-matter of the suit from their parents nor can their parents be regarded as having been expressly or impliedly authorised by them to make the admission (721) per High Court. ——Evidence of—Recitals in deed of alienation if—Ancient and recent alienations—Distinction.

Recitals in deeds of alienation by a Hindu widow as to the necessity for such alienations cannot by themselves be relied upon for the purpose of proving the assertions of fact which they contain. If such proof were permitted the rights of reversioners could always be defeated by the insertion of carefully prepared recitals (252). But in such a case those recitals cannot altogether be disregarded, nor, on the other hand, can any fixed and inflexible rule, however, be laid down as to the proper weight which such recitals are entitled to receive. If the deeds of alienation were challenged at the time or near the date of their execution, so that independent evidence would be available, the recitals would deserve but slight consideration, and certainly should not be accepted as proof of the facts. But, as time goes by and all the original parties to the transaction and all those who could have given evidence on the relevant points have grown old or passed away, a recital consistent with the probability and circumstances of the case assumes greater importance and cannot lightly be set aside; for it should be remembered that the actual proof of the necessity which justified the deed is not essential to establish its validity. It is only necessary that a representation should have been made to the purchaser that such necessity existed, and that he should have acted honestly and made proper inquiry to satisfy himself of its truth. The recital is clear evidence of the representation, and if the circumstances are such as to justify a reasonable belief that an inquiry would have confirmed its truth, then, when proof of actual inquiry has become impossible, the recital, coupled with such circumstances, would be sufficient evidence to support the deed. To hold otherwise would result in deciding that a title becomes weaker as it grows older, so that a transaction - perfectly honest and legitimate when it took place—would ultimately be incapable of justification merely owing to the passing of time (252-3). ——Meaning of.

The word necessity, when used in connection with an alienation by a Hindu widow of her husband's estate, has a somewhat special, almost technical, meaning. A widow can alienate if there are no other means available for the obligatory ceremonies to secure the repose of the soul of her husband. A holder of a Hindu woman's estate can in some circumstances alienate immoveable property to pay the last owner's debts, or (if there is no other available source of supply) for her own or infant children's maintenance. Necessity does not mean actual compulsion, but the kind of pressure which the law recognises as serious and sufficient. The appeal arose out of a suit brought by the respondents to recover possession from the appellant with mesne profits of part of a Zemindary (known as the Chakai estate) in the Monghyr District, to which they claimed that one or other of them had title as reversionary heir of the last male owner.

The last male owner of the estate was one G, who died a minor and unmarried. On his death the estate passed to his mother, D, as his sole heir. She made various alienations of different parts of the estate, by virtue of which the appellant was in possession as the legal representative of his grandfather. One of the questions in the suit (which was instituted after the death of D) was as to the validity of those alienations.

Both the Courts below held that no legal necessity for the alienations had been proved.

——Dedication of very small fraction of corpus for—Validity—Income of estate ample.

The suit was by a reversioner to set aside an alienation purporting to have been made for a religious or pious purpose by a Hindu lady, the widow of one G, G died leaving two minors and a considerable estate, yielding an annual income of some Rs 60,000. Both the minor sons of G died in infancy, and the property then devolved on his widow in succession to her sons.

After the death of G's sons, the widowed mother made pilgrimages to different sacred cities. She visited Puri in 1875, and there made a sankalpa or vow to create a dedication for the observance of bhog or food offerings to the presidin ; deity, and for the maintenance of the priests (pandas) who were charged with the performance of that duty. In 1876 she gave effect to her sankalpa by executing a document purporting to be a gift for the purpose referred to. The suit was to set aside this alienation by the widow. The dedication covered a very small fraction of the property inherited by the lady, something like one-seventy-fifth.

Held, affirming the High Court, that the act which the lady did was fully in accordance with Hindu religious sentiment and religious belief, and was not, therefore, in excess of her powers, having regard to the fact that the dedication related to one-seventy-fifth of the property made specially for the creation of a permanent benefit (394).

Had the lady made the alienation for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the pilgrimage itself, while she possessed ample means for the performance of the journey and other acts connected therewith there might have been some substance in the objection that she was not entitled to alienate any part of the immoveable property having ample means at her disposal. But the alienation she has purported to effect was for the perpetual performance of acts recognised in the Hindu system as pious. RELIGIOUS ACTS—TWO SETS OF—ALIENATION WITH REFERENCE TO.

——Powers of—Distinction—Obsequies of husband and periodical performance of obsequial rites essential for salvation of his soul—Pious observances which conduce to bliss of his soul.

The Hindu system recognises two sets of religious acts. One is in connection with the actual obsequies of the deceased, and the periodical performance of the obsequial rites prescribed in the Hindu religious law, which are considered as essential for the salvation of the soul of the deceased. The other relates to acts which, although not essential or obligatory, are still pious observances which conduce to the bliss of the deceased's soul (391).

With reference to the first class of acts, the powers of the Hindu female who holds the property are wider than in respect of the acts which are simply pious and if performed are meritorious so far as they conduce to the spiritual benefit of the deceased. In one case, if the income of the property, or the property itself, is not sufficient to cover the expenses, she is entitled to sell the whole of it. In the other case she can alienate a small portion of the property for the pious or charitable purpose she may have in view (391 2). REVENUE DUE UPON ESTATE PAID BY CO-SHARERS—DECREE FOR CONTRIBUTION OBTAINED BY THEM.

——Sale by widow to satisfy.

A Hindu widow became liable for her arrears of Government revenue under Act XI of 1859 in respect of a mouzah which she held in her husband's estate with other co-sharers. To save the property from sale under the Act the co sharers paid the revenue due from her and sued her for contribution. They obtained a decree and attached her dwelling-house for the satisfaction of the debt. In consequence thereof she executed a conveyance of a portion of her husband's estate to raise money for discharging the decree debt.

Held that there was sufficient evidence to show that there was a compelling necessity on the part of the widow for executing the sale-deed, and that the sale was therefore binding on the reversioners (141-2). SUBJECT-MATTER OF, IMMOVEABLE OR MOVEABLE PROPERTY.

———Mortgage decree in favour of widow—Purchase of mortgaged property by her at sale in execution—Mortgagor's application to set aside—Compromise by widow on, agreeing to have sale set aside—Alienation by way of—Subject-matter of.

In a suit by the reversionary heirs of a deceased HIndu to recover possession of certain property which was said to have been alienated hy his widow as one of the terms of a compromise of litigation started by him, the plaintiffs contended that the alienation was of immoveable and not of moveable property.

The litigation in question was a suit brought to enforce a mortgage. A decree was passed in favour of the widow and in execution of the decree she purchased six of the properties of the judgment-debtors. Thereupon the judgment-debtors filed a petition in objection to the sale, and the widow came to the compromise in question.

By the compromise she agreed that the sale of the six properties should be set aside, and that the judgment-debtors should be allowed to sell them again to certain proposed purchasers for a total sum to be paid over to her It was further provided that the two other properties should be hers to sell and make what she could of them. The rest of the debt was remitted.

Held, that it would be carrying technicality to an excess to consider the property, the subject-matter of the compromise, as immoveable property.

In the hands of the deceased and in the hands of the widow till the sale it was money secured by a mortgage on immoveable property. For a very brief period it might be said that the widow had converted the property by her purchase at the sale; but even this can hardly be said. The sale had not been confirmed and the compromise was upon the very point whether it should be confirmed, and that is

The action, which was brought in 1886, was laid upon a bond dated 7-11-1881, which bore to have been granted in favour of the appellant by D, who at that time was the manager of the estate.

Held, that it was clearly the duty of the appellant to prove, in order to make his claim under the bond good against the estate in the hands of the respondents, that the senior widow duly executed the bond, because it was her intelligent signature, in the capacity of a Hindu widow representing the estate, which alone could give validity to such a document (2).

ALIENATION—FAMILY SETTLEMENT—TEST.

——Validity.

Held, on the facts, that the compromise in question was in no sense of the word an alienation by a limited owner of the family property, but a family settlement in which each party took a share of the family property by virtue of the independent title which was, to that extent, and by way of compromise, admitted by the other parties.

On A's death, his widow adopted B in pursuance of a power to adopt given to her by her husband. She remained in possession of her husband's property till her death and was succeeded thereupon by the widow of B, who had died during the interval. One of the daughters of A brought a suit against B's widow for the recovery of her share of the property left by A, her father. That suit, in which the plaintiff questioned the adoption of B, was eventually settled by a compromise under which various claimants got their respective shares. In a suit subsequently brought by B's daughter challenging the compromise on the ground that it amounted to an alienation and was beyond her (B's widow's) powers as a Hindu widow, held it was a family settlement, and not an alienation, and was valid. on his death, the entire property which had stood all along in his name in the Collector's register was recorded in the name of his widow.

Disputes then arose between the heirs of D, on the one side, and the widow of R, on the other, in consequence of which the Court of Wards took over, in 1852, possession of the entire estate, recognising the claim of R's widow, but not that of D's heirs, thereto. The widows of D & R died subsequently, and, after their death, that is, in 1860, under the advice of the Collector of the District, the daughters of D, and K, the daughter's son of R, entered into a compromise, by which D's daughters obtained between them an $8\frac{1}{2}$ anna share, taking the entire estate as 16 annas; whiist K received a $7\frac{1}{2}$ anna share. Partition was effected in terms of the compromise, and the parties obtained possession of the respective shares allotted to them.

Plaintiff's mother, one of the daughters of D, survived her sister, and herself died in 1899, whereupon plaintiffs brought a suit claiming as next reversioners to their grandfather, D, to recover possession of the properties held by the defendants under the said deed of compromise, on the allegation that the same was not binding on them (the plaintiffs).

Held, reversing the judgment of the High Court, that the compromise was binding on the plaintiffs (102-3).

In 1863, when the compromise was entered into, the heirs of D had no existing enforceable rights to the share of R, and the entire property was recorded in the name of his widow. Under these circumstances the parties, under the advice of the District Officer, instead of engaging in a long litigation, arrived at a mutual settlement of their claims. The real nature of the compromise is well expressed in the judgment in a prior litigation between the parties thus :— The true character of the transaction appears to us to have been a settlement between the several members of the family of their disputes, each one relinquishing all claim in respect of all property in dispute other than that falling to his share and recognising the right of the others as they had previously asserted it to the portion allotted to them respectively. It was in this light, rather than as conferring a new distinct title on each other, that the parties themselves seem to have regarded the arrangement, and we think that it is the duty of the Courts to uphold and give full effect to such an arrangement (102). HUSBAND'S KINDRED—COMPROMISE WITH—PROPERTY GOT UNDER—ESTATE TAKEN IN.

———Husband's share—Money payment to widow in lieu of, "for her own absolute and separate use"—Effect.

B & S were members of a joint Hindu family. After an agreement of partition between them but before receipt of actual possession in severalty of the share allotted to him, B died, having by his will appointed S, his brother, sole executor. S, who continued in possession of the entire estate, paid to three of B's sons one-fourth share each of B's share in the joint property. D, the fourth son of B, was a minor at the time, and the delivery to him of his one-fourth share was accordingly postponed. D, however, died a minor, intestate, without issue, leaving Z his sole widow and heiress-at-law. S having died in the interval, his son, G, took possession of the whole estate, including D's share.

Disputes, which arose between G & Z with reference to D's share, were settled by a deed of compromise, to which the other three sons of B were, amongst others, parties. The deed of compromise stated that, to settle the disputes between G & Z, it had been mutually agreed between them that Z should be considered as entitled to the sum of Rs. 59,000 in full payment and discharge of all demands, legal and equitable, which Z had, or could, should or might have, against G in respect of the joint estate, or her part and share or interest therein in right of her deceased husband, and that on payment of the said sum G was to be considered to have been released by her from all her claims against him on account of her husband's share. The deed went on to state that it was agreed by and between all the parties that the said sum of Rs. 59,000 was to be the sole and exclusive property of Z, " for her own absolute and separate use."

Held, on a construction of the deed of compromise, that Z look only a widow's interest in the said sum of Rs 59,000, and that it devolved on her death on the heirs-at-law of her husband.

The words "to her separate use" in the deed of compromise are not to be understood in the sense in which that term is used in a Court of equity; but to her separate use as distinguished from the joint estate, dividing that which was joint into separate estate, and treating her share as being that which she is to take for her absolute use in her representative character, subject to any claims that may exist upon the same, for "her sole, absolute, and exclusive use" as against the parties to this deed. If it was a deed in which the recitals had reference to the life estate, and the reversioners had been parties, and the reversioners had

Mouzah A formed part of the ancestral property of a family who, in the year 1826, were representated by K and M, the widow of his first cousin. The two parties were in litigation. K claimed to be entitled to the whole property, subject only to such maintenance as the widow might be entitled to. The widow claimed the whole during her life or widowhood as representing her husband. Under those circumstances the parties came to a compromise in the year 1826, and that compromise was carried into effect in the suit which was then pending for the purpose of settling that question as to the ancestral property. The portion of the compromise material to the appeal was that which related to the interests given in the immoveable property to K and M respectively. As regards that property, the first clause of the Solenama executed by K was that all the villages, whether ancestsal or acquired by purchase, which lay in certain districts and which were held by the deceased husband of M, "shall during the lifetime of the aforesaid Mussumat"—that is M—"remain in equal shares in the joint possession and enjoyment of me the declarant and the aforesaid Mussumat, but the aforesaid Mussumat shall have no power to alienate the moveable or immoveable properties; and after her death all the moveable and immoveable properties, and the outstanding of the time of R," (the husband of M) "and the said Mussumat, shall be the right of me the declarant." A corresponding solenama was executed by M. That compromise was carried into effect by the decree, which merely provided and ordered that the two parties, K and M, "do hold possession and occupation of all the properties left by R conformably to the conditions laid down in the deeds of compromise."

On a question arising as to the nature of the interest taken by M in the estate awarded to her by the compromise, whether it was an interest in the property on condition that she should not alienate, with the result that by an alienation she broke the condition and forfeited the estate, or whether she took a life interest in the property which she could deal with freely and the only restriction was that she should not alienate in p rpetuity, held that, on the right construction of the compromise, the latter of the contentions was the right one (214). On the construction of the will of a deceased Hindu a question arose between his widow and his brother as to the right to the income of the estate during 8 years after the death of the testator. That income had not been specifically disposed of by the will. regarding the accumulated income of 8 years, and the nature of the widow's claim in regard to it. The deed then stated that S had consented and agreed to concede the point in question, and to give up to the widow as heiress of her husband the accumulated income of 8 years It went on to state that, in order to avoid the delay and expense of taking an account of the accumulations, it had been agreed by the parties that the amount should be taken at Rs. 2,89,000, and, that amount having been paid to her, the widow granted a full discharge of all her claims for those accumulations. By the same deed the widow relinquished certain other claims on receipt of certain amounts in respect of the same. The several sums payable and paid under that deed amounted in the aggregate to Rs. 4,75.450, and the payment was made in currency notes of various amounts, the most of those being one thousand rupee notes, others being notes for Rs. 500 and Rs. 100.

It was contended that the widow claimed and accepted the accumulated income of 8 years as a capitalised sum which in her hands was part of the capital of the estate of her husband: that she, therefore, acquired only a Hindu widow's interest in the fund, and was not entitled to alienate it or deal with it in any way which might deprive her husband's heirs of their right to receive it as part of his estate to which they had a right of succession.

Held, overruling the contention, 'that the claim of the widow to that part of the income of her husband's estate was made by her as heiress of her husband entitled to income not disposed of, that she claimed that income as her absolute property, and that there was nothing in the language of the deed of agreement, or in the transaction with S which could support the contention that she agreed to receive that income as capital in which she should acquire only the estate of a Hindu widow, or that the nature of the fund should differ in any way after she received it from what it had been before (22-3). On the death of a Hindu subject to the Mithakshara law, leaving behind him a brother, a widow, and a minor daughter by her, the brother instituted a suit against the widow and daughter of the deceased and induced the widow to enter into a compromise on behalf of her daughter by which the widow abandoned all claim to the property of the deceased and admitted that he had been born blind and was consequently excluded by Hindu law from all right of inheritance and that the brother was entitled to the whole property by survivorship. The widow was given under the compromise a fourth of the family property for her life with remainder to plaintiff. A decree was passed in pursuance of the compromise. In a suit brought by the daughter against her uncle and mother inter alia for a declaration that the compromise and decree aforesaid were not binding on her, it appeared that to the uncle's knowledge the deceased was not born blind and that, when he induced the widow to enter into the compromise, he had no honest and bona fide belief in the claim which he was making. Held, that the compromise and decree could not affect the right of the daughter and she was entitled to a declaration to that effect (Sir John Edge). ———Mortgage decree obtained by widow and mortgaged properties purchastd by her in execution thereof—Mortgagor's application to set aside sale—Compromise on, allowing sale to be set aside on certain terms and remitting portion of debt—Validity of.

A suit to enforce two mortgage bonds instituted by a Hindu was, after his death, continued by his widow. In that suit a decree was passed in favour of the widow for the recovery of a sum of a lac and 41,000 odd rupees. In execution of the decree; 6 of the properties were sold and purchased by the widow, with leave to bid, for the sum of Rs. 65,000 odd. The judgment-debtors applied to set aside the sale. Thereupon the widow entered into a compromise with the judgment-debtors, whereby it was agreed that the sale of the 6 properties should be set aside, that the judgment-debtors should be allowed to sell them again to certain persons for a sum of Rs. 66,000 to be paid over to her, and that the widow should have power to sell the two other properties and to appropriate the proceeds to herself. It was estimated that by the sale of those two properties the widow would probably obtain Rs. 5,000. The rest of the debt, Rs. 70,000 odd, was remitted.

One of the motives of the widow for entering into the compromise was no doubt the fact that the judgment-debtors were her relations and she did not wish absolutely to impoverish them It appeared, however, that the judgment-debtors had no other available property. and that the real value of the property released was only Rs, 3,000. It was also found that there was no fraud or collusion in the matter of the compromise.

Held that the compromise was reasonable in the circumstances of the case, and was binding on the estate.

Li igation in respect of this very subject matter had already once taken the widow to the Privy Council, and though the objections of the judgment-debtors were of the stock kind and not likely to prevail, still with judgment debtors who had little or nothing to lose it was likely that their objections would have been carried as far as the High Court. REVERSIONER'S RIGHT TO DISPUTE—ESTOPPEL.

———Reversioner responsible for compromise and taking benefit under it.

B, the surviving member of a joint family, died in 1883 without male issue but leaving a widow and a daughter. On his death his widow became entitled to the entire estate owned by him for her life. Her title was, however, disputed by the widows of B's two predeceased brothers and by the appellant, one of the reversionary heirs of B. The appellant claimed the entire estate on the ground that he had been adopted by ths widow of one of B's predeceased brothers ; and the widows of the predeceased brothers alleged that B and his brothers had separated and that they were entitled each to one-third of the family estate. One of those widows also supported the case of the appellant as to his adoption by her. Thereupon B's widow sued the widows of his predeceased brothers for a declaration that B had been the owner and in possession of the entire estate, that she became entitled to the same after his death, and that the defendants had no right other than that of mainte nance. That suit was settled by a compromise in 1892, whereby one-fourth of the family property was allotted to each of B's widow, his daughter, and the widows of his brothers, and they respectively obtained possession of the properties allotted to them. The appellant got no share in the family property, but in fact he got the one-fourth share which was allotted to his alleged adoptive mother; and he further obtained the benefit of having the validity of his adoption left undecided by a Court of law. Subsequent to the compromise, the appellant's alleged adoptive mother executed in his favour a deed of relinguish-ment of the property which had been allotted to her under the compromise. That deed of relinquishment recited the fact of the appellant's adoption, and declared that the appel-lant was the owner of all her husband's property. In accord-ance with that deed of relinguishment, the appellant obtain-ed mutation of names in his own favour, and throughout enjoyed the share of his alleged adoptive mother as his own property, and his right to it was not questioned by any body.

In a suit instituted by the appellant, after the death of B's widow, to recover as reversionary heir of B, the properties allotted to the other parties to the compromise of 1892, held that, the appellant was bound by the said compromise, and could not claim as reversionary heir as against it (124).

The claim of the appellant that he had been adopted by the widow of one of the predecea ed brothers was a serious one; it was supported by his alleged adoptive mother; and if it had been substantiated, the appellant would have been entitled to the whole family property, and B's widow would have been entitled only to maintenance. His claim must, therefore, have mainly influenced B's widow in entering into the compromise and thereby consenting to a division of the family property, in which she obtained for herself only a one-fourth share. The claims of the widows of the pre-deceased brothers must also have influenced her to agree to the compromise. The appellant was a party to that com-promise. He was one of those whose claims to the family property, or to shares in it, induced B's widow, against her own interests and those of her daughter, and greatly to her own detriment, to alter her position by agreeing to the compromise, and under that compromise he obiained a substantial benefit; which he has hitherto enjoyed. He is bound by it, and cannot now claim as a reversioner (123 4). (Sir John Edge.) KANHAI LAL v. BRIJ LAL.

The daughter's sons of a deceased Hindu sued for a declaration of the invalidity of a compromise by their mother under which she transferred a portion of their grand-father's property to a collateral of his. The defendant in the suit was a person who had taken a mortgage of that portion from the collateral subsequent to the said com-promise and had obtained a decree on foot of that mort-gage. The High Court found that the compromise was invalid and not binding on the reversionary heirs but upheld the title of the respondent on the ground that he was a bona fide transferee for value, and so stood in a better position than his transferor.

Held that, as against the reversioners, it was not within the power of the collateral to transfer a larger legal title than he himself had, and that, as the reversioners had not, by any act or omission, debarred themselves from insisting on that contention, the title of the respondent could not prevail against them. DISPUTE AS TO HUSBAND'S ESTATE BETWEEN—REFERENCE TO ARBITRATION OF—SCOPE OF.

———Unchastity of one of widows and her consequent disability to inherit—Question as to, if included.

The suit was brought by the plaintiff, the younger widow of one D, to recover half of the property which had been left by D. The defendant was the elder widow of the deceased. The defandant pleaded, inter alia, that the matters between the parties had been referred to arbitration by an agreement in writing, that there was an award of the arbitrators which decided that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover half of the property, and that the suit was therefore barred.

The submission was made by two argeements, one signed by the plaintiff, and the other by the defendant. That signed by the plaintiff was in favour of certain named arbitrators and was to the effect that there was a difference between the younger widow and the elder about their respective rights ; that the younger widow had appointed the persons so named as arbitrators; that she would accept what the arbitrators might give as the limit of her rights. The agreement signed by the elder widow was precisely similar in its purport. The allegation of the elder widow was that the younger was guilty of unchastity which disentitled her to succeed to any portion of the estate of her deceased husband. The arbitrators went into the question of the alleged unchastity of the younger widow, found that she was unchaste, and held that she was not entitled to inherit any portion of her husband's estate but was entitled only to maintenance.

Held, differing from the court below, that the arbitrators had not exceeded their authority in entering into the question of the unchastity of the younger widow (69).

The reference is a general reference to the arbitrators to decided between the two widows upon their respective rights, and particularly with respect to the younger widow, what was the limit of her rights, raising the entire question not merely whether she was entitled to maintenance, but whether there were facts which would disentitle her to succeed to any portion of the estate of her deceased husband (69). ———If a Hindu dies leaving two widows, they succeed as joint tenants with a right of survivorship. They are entitled to obtain a partition of separate portions of the property so that each may enjoy her equal share of the income accruing therefrom. Each can deal as she pleases with her own life-interest, but she cannot alienate any part of the corpus of the estate by gift or will so as to prejudice the rights of the survivor or a future reversioner. If they act together they can burden the reversion with any debts contracted owing to legal necessity, but one of them acting without the authority of the other cannot prejudice the right of survivorship by burdening or alienating any part of the estate. MORTGAGE BY ONE OF, NOT FRAMED SO AS TO BIND OTHER.

———What amounts to—Effect of.

One of two widows, who had jointly succeeded to the estate of their deceased husband, executed a mortgage-deed with possession in respect of a portion of the estate, which recited that the mortgaged property had devolved upou her as widow of her deceased husband and that it had been in her possession and enjoyment, and which contained many stipulations which were personal to the mortgagor and could not be held to be binding or to have been intended to be binding upon the other widow or her interest in the event of her surviving. At the time the mortgage deed was executed and for some years afterwards the widow who executed the deed was contending that her co-widow as junior widow took no interest in the estate, but was merely entitled to maintenance. In a suit brought to enforce the mortgage after the death of the mortgagor against the estate in the hands of the other widow as the survivor, held that the mortgage was not, on its true construction, so framed as to bind the estate in the hands of the other widow, as the surviving widow (190-1). ———Effect of—No enlargement of estate by.

The widows of a Hindu who have inherited his estate have no power by a compromise between themselves with regard to that estate to affect the rights of the reversioners therein.

Where two widows who had inherited the estate of their husband entered into a compromise whereby they divided the estate between them and each was declared to have no claim whatever to the portion that fell to the share of the other, held that the compromise could only apply to the shares to which the widows were entitled as widows and that a mortgage of the estate by them would not, unless effected for a purpose binding on the estate, be binding on it.

Under the compromise the widows simply were entitled to their shares as for what is called the widow's estate. (Sir Richard Couch.) DHARAM CHAND PAL v. BHAWANI MISRAIN. (1897) 24 I. A. 183 = 25 C. 189 = 1 C.W.N. 697 = 7 Sar. 249.

———Permissibility of—Scope and effect of.

Widows taking a joint interest in the inheritance of their husbands have no doubt no right to enforce an absolute partition of the joint estate between them. But a case may be made out entitling one of several widows to the relief of separate possession of a portion of the inheritance. Such relief can and ought to be granted when from the nature or situation of the property and the conduct of the co-widows or co-widow it appears to be the only proper and effectual mode of securing the enjoyment of her distinct right to an equal share of the benefits of the estate (221).

Where it appeared that the widows of a deceased Hindu could not go on peaceably in the joint enjoiment of his estate, and that they had acted as if they had agreed that they were separately to enjoy their respective shares, leaving the title to each share unaffected, their Lordships, guarding themselves against being supposed to affirm by their order that either widow had power to dispose of the share of the estate allotted to her, or that they had any right to a partition in the proper sense of the term, confirmed the order below under which the profits of her share of the estate was to go to each widow during their joint lives, their respective rights by survivorship and otherwise remaining unaffected ———Right of, inter se—Title to property in others—Possession lawfully obtained and peaceably held by widows for a long time.

The appellant and the respondent were the widows of one B. The appellant sued the respondent for partition and separate possession of certain properties which appertained to the estate of B. B had, during his lifetime, adopted one P and had executed a will bequeathing his whole estate to P, subject to provisions for the maintenance of his (B's) mother and of his widows. P survived B and died a minor in 1879. From that date down to the date of suit, May, 1883, the appellant and the respondent were in joint possession of the estates of B, including the suit properties, describing themselves sometimes as the widows of B and sometimes as mothers of P.

The High Court held that the appellant was not entitled to a decree for partition, and dismissed her suit. While recognising that 'Possession is a good title against all the world except the person who can show a better title," and that "By reason of his possession such person has an interest which can be sold or devised," the learned Judges distinguished the case before them, observing " In this case there is nothing of the kind; parties come and claim an estate to which they are not entitled. They set up a false claim. They have no estate in law which they could divide. To do so would be to recognise an illegal transaction, and we would be dividing an estate which has no legal existence".

Their Lordships reversed the High Court, and decreed the suit, observing: "The fact of joint possession by the widows of the estates which belonged to B, ever since the death of P in 1879 is sufficient for disposing of this suit in favour of the appellant. The possession of the widows was lawfully attained, in this sense, that it was not procured by force or fraud, but peaceably, no one interested opposing. In these circumstances it does not admit of doubt that they are entitled to maintain their possession against all comers except the heirs of P or of B, one or other of whom (it is unnecessary to say which) is the only person who can plead a preferable title. But neither of these possible claimants is in the field, and the widows have, therefore, each of them, an estate or interest in respect of her possession, which cannot be impaired by the circumstance that they may have ascribed their possession to one or more other titles which do not belong to them. It is impossible to hold that a joint estate is not also partible (193-4). (Lord Watson.) MUSSAMMAT SUNDAR v. MUSSAMMAT PARBATI. (1889) 16 I. A. 186 = 12 A 51 = 5 Sar. 448.

Here the so-called partition was between two widows, each having the limited interest of a Hindu widow in her husband's estate. It does not appear that it was made at the suit or on the application of either. It was made by Order of a Judge who, in the particular proceeding (one under Act XIX of 1841), had no jurisdiction to determine questions of title; and who could only deal with the right to possession. It is difficult to see how such a partition could enlarge either widow's estate, so as to give her a disposition which she would not otherwise have had against the next heirs of her husband (515-6). RES JUDICATA AGAINST REVERSIONERS.

———Shivagunga case.

The same principle, which has obtained in England as to tenants-in-tail representing the inheritance, would seem to apply to the case of a Hindu widow; and it is obvious that there would be the greatest possible inconvenience in holding that the succeeding heirs were not bound by a decree fairly and properly obtained against the widow.

A decree in a suit brought for a zamindary by a Hindu widow binds those claiming the zamindary in succession to her. Unless the decree can be successfully impeached on some special ground, it will be an effectual bar to any new suit by any person claiming in succession to her. For, assuming her to be entitled to the zamindary at all, the whole estate would, for the time, be vested in her, absolutely for some purposes, though, in some respects, for a qualified interest; and, until her death, it could not be ascertained who would be entitled to succeed. ———Award—Decree based on.

Disputes between a Hindu daughter in possession of property as heiress of her father and the latter's agnatic male relations who contested her right to hold the property were referred to arbitrators. Before the arbitrators had taken any action in the matter a compromise was arrived at. This compromise was placed before the arbitrators and they were invited to make an award in accordance therewith, which they did. The daughter's husband represented her in those transactions, and, as she herself did not acquiesce in the award, the opposite party applied tp the civil court under the provisions of S. 327 of the Code of 1859 (the law that regulated at the time the procedure of Civil Courts in India) for a decree on the award. In those proceedings, the court made a decree "to have the award filed and enforced under S. 327." The result of the decision was to put the daughter out of possession of the properties covered by the compromise, which were practically all the properties she had inherited from her father.

In a suit brought by her son after her death for the recovery of the properties which his mother had been deprived of in virtue of the above-mentioned proceedings on the ground that the arbitration proceedings and the decree on the award were not binding on the plaintiff,

Held, that the proceedings culminating in the said decree were entirely devoid of the conditions on which, and which alone, a reversioner can be shut out from the assertion of his right, which comes to him altogether independently of the female owner (40). ———Estoppel against widow and merits—Decree based on.

A Hindu widow, who had become entitled to a Hindu widow's estate on the death of her infant son, sued for a declaration that B, who claimed to have been adopted by her to her deceased husband, had in fact never been adopted by her and that her husband had never given her authority to adopt a son. That suit went upon appeal to the Privy Council which dismissed the suit, holding that the widow was estopped by her conduct from denying the validity of B's adoption, and that, on the facts of the case, the adoption was true and valid. In a suit brought after the death of the widow by the reversionary heir impugning the validity of the adoption of B, held, that the suit was barred by the principle of res judicata by reason of the decision of the Board in the widow's suit.

It has been urged that the widow cannot be regarded as having represented the estate in her suit against B, as by her acts she was personally estopped from denying that she had validly adopted him to her husband In the absence of all authority, their Lordships cannot decide that a Hindu lady, otherwise qualified to represent an estate in litigation, ceases to be so qualified merely owing to personal disability or disadvantage as a litigant, although the merits are tried and the trial is fair and honest. The principle is that reversioners must risk that, so that there may be an end to litigation (178-9). There can, therefore, be no doubt, in their Lordships' opinion, that the widow in her suit against B did, notwithstanding the personal estoppel under which she laboured, represent the estate on the question of fact as to whether B had or had not been validly adopted, and that she represented the estate within the meaning of the rule in the Shivagunga case (178). ———Limitation against widow—Decree based on.

The plaintiff was the son of S, a daughter of R, the last male owner of the suit property, and sued to recover a two-thirds share of the properties of R, who died in 1847, leaving a widow P, and five daughters of whom S, one. S, was the survivor of the daughters. The 1st defendant, the son of another daughter, alleged that S had, after the death of P, instituted a suit for possession of all the properties under claim against him; that her claim was dismissed on the ground of limitation, it having been established that, after the death of P, S was never in possession of any of the properties left by R; and that the plaintiff was bound by that decree, and his suit was therefore barred. The High Court found the facts alleged by the defendant and held that the suit was barred.

Their Lordships affirmed the High Court (192).

It was contended that the effect of Art. 142 of the Limitation Act of 1871, and of Art. 141 in the Schedule to the Act of 1877, was that a decree against a Hindu widow or daughter founded upon the law of limitation was by virtue of those articles excepted from the rule of res judicata laid down in the Shivagunga case, and therefore that the decree of 1881 against S only bound her, and the plaintiff had by the terms of Art. 141 of the Limitation Act, 1877 a period of 12 years from her death to bring his suit.

The words "entitled to the possession of immoveable property" in Art. 141 of the Limitation Act, 1877 refer to the then existing law. Under that law the plaintiff being bound by the decree against S would not be entitled to bring a suit for possession. Art. 141 cannot be construed as altering the law respecting the effect of a decree. Their Lordships approve of the judgment of the High Court, where it says, "We think, therefore, that on the authorities cited the plaintiff is bound by the decree in the previous suit, and that he cannot maintain this suit" (192). band, A, by C, and a title by adverse possession to the suit properties. C denied the validity of A's adoption on the ground of his having been a natural brother of her husband and an orphan at the time of his adoption. That suit was decreed in M's favour on the ground that her claim of adverse possession for 12 years had been established;

Held, that the decision in the suit of 1887 was binding on the reversioners entitled to succeed to the estate of C's husband on her death.

In the suit of 1887 C was no doubt personally interested to defeat M's claim for the possession of lands which had been in her own possession as the widow of her husband from 1849, when her husband died, until 1862, when she made over possession to A, but although her object in resisting M's claim was probably a purely personal and selfish object, she did, in fact and in law in that suit, represent the estate, as well as her own interest, as a Hindu widow. The suit of 1887 was not a collusive suit; it was regularly and according to due procedure at law fought out in the Sub-Court and in the High Court. ——The judgment of the Board in the Shivaganga case established the principle of the representation of the inheritance by a Hindu widow. That case was decided during the currency of the Limitation Act of 1859. The judgment in L.R. 20 I A. 183 held that the effect of the Limitation Acts of 1871 and 1877 was not to except from the rule laid down in the Shivagunga decision the case where a decree had been obtained against a Hindu widow in her lifetime founded upon the law of limitation. It is therefore established by this decision that where a decree founded upon the law of limitation is obtained against the widow in her lifetime the reversionary heir is barred and does not get the benefit of Art. 141 of the Limitation Act.

Where, however, there has been no decree against the widow or other act in the law in the widow's lifetime depriving the reversionary heir of the right to possession on the widow's death, the heir is entitled, after the widow's death, to rely upon Art. 141 for the purpose of the determination of the question whether the title is barred by lapse of time. To hold otherwise would in effect compel the Court in determining a question within the scope of the article to ignore the express words of the article. (Lord Tomlin.) MT. A Hindu widow having allowed the maintenance payable to her mother-in-law to fall into arrear, the latter sued her personally for the recovery of the said arrear with interest. The decree passed in that suit ordered that the mother-in-law should recover from the daughter-in-law a stated sum on account of her claim. In execution of that decree, the right, title, and interest of the daughter-in-law in certain property inherited by her from her husband was sold. The notification of the sale was that a sale would be held of whatever right and interest the judgment debtor had in the property, and it was specifically pointed out that besides the right and interest of the judgment-debtor the right and interest of no other person would be sold at the said auction

Held, that what was intended to be sold and what was sold at the said sale was the widow's interest only of the daughter-in-law, and not the absolute estate in the property (280-1).

The claim in respect of which the decree was obtained was a personal debt of the daughter-in-law. The decree was a personal decree against her. ——Mesne profits and costs—Decree for, against widow and other members of husband's family—Execution of, against only widow's share of property—Sale of right, and interest of widow in.

A suit was instituted by the daughter of a member of a joint family for the recovery of her father's share in the family property as his heiress. The defendants in that suit were the surviving male members of the family, S, the widow of another deceased member, and B, the reversionary heir of S's husband. S remained ex parte; but the other members set up in defence a hibbanamah by the plaintiff's father by which it was alleged that the plaintiff's father had conveyed his share to them. That defence was found against, and a decree was passed in plaintiff's favour against all the defendants, including S, for possession, mesne profits and costs. In execution of that decree for mesne profits and costs, S's right, title, and interest in her share of the family property was sold.

Held, that under the execution sale the entire property itself, and not merely the right therein of S as widow passed (74).

If in the execution of that decree the right, title, and interest of all the other members of the family had been sold, then, although one portion of it was represented by the widow, S, the whole property would have passed to the purchaser. The reversionary interest of B would have passed, although the share of S's husband was represented by her. There is no reason why the same result should not follow merely because the execution was against only the widow's share of the property. The description of the property sold as her right, title, and interest, in accordance with the provisions of S. 249 of C. P. C. of 1859 is not conclusive of the sale being of the widow's right only. Looking to the judgment in the suit in which the decree was passed, their Lordships are of opinion that the whole interest in the estate passed under the sale in execution (72-4). S. 249 of C. P. C. of 1859 enacts that the proclamation of a sale in execution shall declare "that sale extends only to the right, title, and interest of the defendant in the property specified therein." In the case of a widow it is necessary that the proclamation shall make that statement. But there are many cases in which when the right, title and interest of the widow is sold the whole interst in the estate passes. In other cases the whole interest does not pass. The case depends upon the nature of the suit in which the execution issues. If the suit is simply for a personal claim against the widow, then merely the widow's qualified interest is sold, and the reversionary interest is not bound by it. If, on the other hand, the suit is against the widow in respect of the estate, or for a cause which is not a mere personal cause of action against the widow, then the whole estate passes. In many of the cases, although the right, title, and interest of the widow had been sold, the whole interest in the estate was held to have passed and the reversionary heir to be bound by it (73-4). ———Sale of Land for Revenue Arrears Act I of 1845, S. 9—Suit against widow under, for recovery of revenue arrears payable by her but in fact paid by plaintiff—Decree in—Sale in execution of.

H, the mortgagor of a Talook, died leaving no male issue but only a widow. Similarly, N, the mortgagee, died leaving only a widow, who became entitled to his rights as mortgagee of the Talook. To save the Talook from being sold under Act I of 1845 for revenue allowed to fall into arrears by H's widow, N's widow borrowed money from the father of the appellants and paid up the arrear of revenue due in respect of the Talook. Thereafter N's widow sued H's widow for the recovery of the amount so paid by her. The plaint in that suit did not raise any claim against the estate itself and only sought relief against H's widow personally. The decree made in that suit was similarly a general decree against H's widow, and was not a decree against the land. That decree was assigned by N's widow in favour of the appellants. They attempted to execute the decree by a sale of the whole Talook, but their claim was successfully opposed by the reversionary heirs of H. Thereupon the appellants instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose. The suit was brought under the provisions of S. 9 of Act I of 1845; it sought repayment only under that section, as against H's widow, and to have the Talook sold for that purpose.

The High Court held that they had not to decide the question whether, by payment of the revenue in arrear, the person who had such an interest in the Talook as to entitle her to pay the arrear, and who thereby saved the Talook from being sold did not thereby acquire a lien or charge on the Talook to the extent of the money so paid and interest thereon, but that the question they had to decide was simply and merely whether that equity could be enforced in a suit brought under the provisions of S. 9 of Act I of 1845, which was confined to the object authorised by that section, and which did not proceed against the persons who had an interest in the property in succession after the death of the widow in possession.

Held that the High Court came to a correct conclusion as to the construction of S. 9 of Act I of 1845 (265-6).

The person who pays the arrears of the revenue must, if he seek to enforce the charge acquired on the Talook which he saves from sale, do so in a suit properly framed for that purpose, and not merely in a suit which is confined to a personal remedy against the person in possession of the Talook. If the person who so pays the arrears of revenue seek repayment only under S. 9 of Act I of 1845, as against the person in possession of the Talook, who has but a limited interest therein, and confines his suit to that object, the decree so obtained against the person in possession can only be made effectual against the property of that person, including such interest as she had in the Talook (266). SALE IN EXECUTION OF—MINOR SON—INTEREST OF.

———If and when passes under sale—Bengal Act XI of 1859—Sale under.

The appellant, pursuing his remedy for rent under Bengal Act X of 1859, in the Collector's Court, had obtained a decree for the arrears of rent in respect of which he sued against C, as the widow of G and the guardian of her infant son H. In that suit the case set up by the defendants was, that H was not the heir of his father, that he had been adopted into another family, and that consequently the widow was the sole heiress and representative. The decree was against the widow in that capacity. It declared that the son was not liable, and ended with a declaration, which clearly pointed to the realisation of the demand out of the estates of G, and showed that the decree was made against the person supposed to be the heir and representative of G. Other difficulties being interposed in the way of executing that decree, appellant instituted a suit in the Zillah Court and obtained a decree, in effect, establishing that H was the heir of G. Thereupon the execution of the Collector's decree, which had been stayed in the interval, was proceeded with, and the interest of the widow was sold under Act XI of 1859, and was purchased by the decree-holder.

Held, reversing the High Court, that the entire estate passed under the sale, and not merely the widow's interest therein.

The proceedings took place under Act XI of 1859, and that Act appears to contemplate that the estate should be put up for sale, and that the person whose interest should be nominally sold should be the registered proprietor. In this case, the widow was the registered proprietor. But the case does not rest there, because in the certificate of sale there is a distinct reference to the decree obtained by the appellant from the Zillah Court, and, therefore, the whole proceeding, if fairly looked at, amounts to this,—that the estate of G was sold under that decree in execution for his debt, and that the interest of his widow, the registered proprietor and ostensible owner of the estate, and also the interest of his son, if he had any interest, was bound by that decree (615-6). WILL OF HUSBAND—WIDOW WITH WIDOW'S ESTATE AND POWER OF APPOINTMENT GIVEN BY—DECREE AGAINST.

———Effect of, against heir subsequently appointed by her under power,

M, an Oudh talookdar, executed a will appointing his wife full owner and proprietor of the taluk after his death, with power to appoint an heir to and representative of the talook. On M's death, his widow executed a will appointing the respondent heir to and representative of the talook afte her death. Thereupon the appellant, the daughter's son of M, instituted a suit for a declaration that he was entitled to succeed to the taluk as heir, by virtue of Act I of 1869, being, as he alleged, a daughter's son, who had been treated by M as a son within the meaning of S. 22, cl (4) of the Act. He also prayed for the cancellation of the wills of M and of his widow. The defendants to that suit were M's widow, the respondent, then a minor, and certain others. It was ultimately held by the P. C. in that suit that the will of M had been duly revoked by him in his lifetime, and that the appellant was entitled, under Act I of 1869, to succeed, as ab intestato, to the talookdari estate of M.

In a suit subsequently instituted by the respondent, raising the same issue upon the revocation of M's will, the respondent contended that he was not bound by the judgment in the prior suit, because he was a minor when the former suit was commenced, and he was not represented therein by a duly appointed guardian.

Held that, even if the respondent was not bound as a party to the suit, M's widow fully represented the estate in the previous litigation, and that consequently the judgment in the former suit against her was binding on the respondent (207).

Under M's will, until his widow had appointed another to be owner and representative, her estate in the taluq was sufficient to constitute her the full representative of it in the former suit. Her estate was at least as large as that of a Hindu widow in her husband's property, and a decree fairly and properly obtained against her is, under the ruling in the Shivagunga case, binding on the respondent (207). Widow—Family arrangement by.

———Alienation by way of—Benefit under — Reversioner taking—Estoppel as against, and his heirs as regards disputing validity of alienation.

The question in the appeal was as to the validity of an ijara executed on 7—9—1863, for a term of 60 years, by a Hindu widow named S.

It appeared that the ijara was part of a general family settlement whereby the widow divided up the family property amongst the various reversioners, reserving to herself only a comparatively small annual income which might fairly be looked on as representing maintenance. A was one of such reversioners. He was one of the actual lessees under the ijara, and he principally benefited by it.

A died in 1882, so that S (who died in 1893) survived him 11 years. The appellants were four sons of A, and on the death of S they became entitled directly to share in any family property of which she was the life tenant. They brought the suit out of which the appeal arose to set aside the ijara, on the ground that it was an unauthorised interference by the widow with the reversionary interest which did not belong to her. It appeared, however, that from the year 1882, when A died, to the year 1893, when S died, they (the appellants) themselves took the benefit of the family arrangement represented by the ijara in question.

Held, that it was a fair inference from the conduct of the appellants that they believed that the arrangement had been made in good faith, and under such circumstances of necessity as would give it validity according to Hindu law (805). ———In 1868, the surviving widow of a deceased Hindu alienated most of her husband's properties by and under three deeds. By one of these she made a gift of certain of these properties to her brother ; by another she purported to sell half of certain other lands to one A, who, on the widow's death in 1912, was the nearest heir of her deceased husband, and by the third she sold the other half of those properties to her son-in-law. There was only one small property left unalienated. The three deeds were all executed and registered on the same day. The deed of a gift in favour of the brother was attested by A and the son-in-law ; the deed of sale in favour of the son-in-law was attested by A and the brother ; and the sale.deed in favour of A was attested by the brother and the son-in-law. And the widow as executant was identified before the Registrar in respect of all three deeds by A. In 1882 A sold the properties purchased by him as aforesaid at a profit of Rs. 1,000. A, who survived the widow by nearly 6 years did not in his lifetime seek to set aside the alienations in favour of the brother and the son-in law.

In 1918, A's sons and grandsons instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose to recover the properties alienated by the widow on the ground that the alienations were not valid. Owing to the long lapse of time, no proof was forthcoming as to what actually occurred between the parties on the occasion of the said alienations. There was not sufficiently definite evidence to come to a conclusion as to how far any of those properties were validly encumbered, or what was done with the purchase money alleged to have passed on the two deeds of sale.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Widow—Family arrangement by—(Contd.)

Held, that the decision of the case depended upon how far the three documents could be taken as separate and independent, or so connected as to form one transaction ; that all the circumstances strongly pointed to the three documents being part and parcel of one transaction by which a disposition was made of the last owner's estate, such as was likely to prevent disputes in the future and therefore in the best interests of all the parties ; that A himself being a party to and benefiting by the transaction evidenced by the deeds was precluded from questioning any part of it ; and that the plaintiffs who claimed under or through A had no better title to succeed in the suit than A had.

The parties to the documents included, or after so great a lapse of time may be presumed in a very real sense to have included, all persons who had any actual or possible interest in the properties—namely, the widow herself, her brother, who was a natural object of her affection and bounty, her son-in-law, who was the natural protector of the interests of her daughter and grandson, and A, the nearest kinsman on the husband's side and the only person from whom any opposition might be apprehended with regard to dealings by the widow concerning her husband's estate (402). ———Division of husband's estate among reversioners and reserving to widow only maintenance—Arrangement effecting—Ijara executed by widow as part of with consent of all then reversioners who took benefits under transaction—Validity of ijara against actual reversioners.

The question in the appeal was as to the validity of an ijara executed on 7—9—1863, for a term of 60 years, by a Hindu widow named S.

S was the widow of B, who died in 1832 without leaving any issue, making her his sole heiress. The property consisted chiefly of landed property of considerable value.

S was dispossessed of the property by one of her husband's relatives, D, and was compelled, in 1844, to bring a suit against him and his two brothers, G & A, to recover it. That litigation lasted till 1858, when the rights of S to the estate of her husband were finally established by the Privy Council. S, however, did not thereupon obtain possession of the property. Further difficulties were raised and much of the property was threatened with the growth of adverse rights in the actual possessors of the land, who refused to pay rent under the pretext that the title had not been settled. The whole estate was in fact in very serious peril.

While that state of things was still continuing, the ijara in question was soon executed by the widow. That ijara was evidently part of a general family settlement whereby the widow divided up the family property amongst the various reversioners, reserving to herself only a comparatively small annual income which might fairly be looked on as representing maintenance. The ijara itself was granted to A and S who was the son of G who had died in the interval. The third brother, D, did not directly take any interest under the ijara, but in October 1863 a dar-ijara was granted to his son of a portion of the property, and a large sum due from him on account of mesne profits was remitted by S, so that it was clear that all branches of the family shared in the settlement. So far as the persons were concerned who then represented the reversion, it was clear that all this was done with their consent. They all took large interests under the arrangement, and continued to enjoy them so long as they lived.

A died in 1882, and S in 1893. The appellants were four sons of A, and on the death of S they became entitled directly to share in any family property of which she was the life-tenant. They brought the suit out of which the appeal arose to set aside the ijara, on the ground that it was an unauthorised interference by the widow with the reversionary interest which did not belong to her.

The courts below decided that, on the facts of the case, the arrangement of which the ijara formed part was in truth dictated by the necessities of the case, and that the choice of the term of 60 years as the term of the ijara was made for the benefit of the estate and did not injure any one.

Their Lordships affirmed the judgments below (804).

The case depends entirely on the facts, and it raises no new question of law as to the powers of a Hindu widow to deal with family property in case of necessity with the consent of the then present reversioners (804). ———Division of husband's estate between daughters and grandsons then living—Arrangement effecting — Nature and effect of—Vesting of property in daughters effectively —Division intended to have effect only during joint lives of daughters.

The question was whether an arrangement by which a Hindu widow, who had inherited the property of her deceased husband, made a division of the whole of that property among her three daughters and her grandsons then living, certain parts of the property being given to the grandsons and the remainder being divided equally among the daughters, was a family arrangement effectively vesting in the daughters the shares allotted to them, with the result that none of the daughters could set up any claim at any time thereafter inconsistent with the terms of an arrangement, or whether it was an arrangement made merely for convenience of administration, and intended to have effect only during the joint lives of the daughters. Held, that the arrangement was of the former nature and not of the latter.

The view that the division was made for convenience of administration, and was intended to have effect only during the joint lives of the daughters is wholly inconsistent with the account of the transaction given by the witnesses, with the fact that shares were given to grandsons who had no present interest in the property, and with the conduct of all the parties to the arrangement who, for a period of 38 years, had dealt as absolute owners with the property allotted to them. ———Division of husband's estate between daughters and grandsons—Arrangement effecting, acted upon for a long time, alienations being also made on faith of it—Claim inconsistent with — Maintainability — Grandson's right to question arrangement.

N, a Hindu, died in 1856, leaving him surviving a widow, P, and three daughters. On his death his estate devolved on P. In 1875, P, claiming to be absolutely entitled to the property in her possession, made a division of the whole of it among her three daughters and her grandsons then living. Certain parts of the property were given to the grandsons, who were sons of D and H (the plaintiff), and the remainder was divided into three groups for which the daughters drew lots. The lot which included the suit village fell to M, the third daughter. The daughters and grandsons entered into immediate possession of their lots; and mutation of names was effected shortly afterwards, probably in the lifetime of P.

P died in 1876, and after her death each of the daughters dealt with the property allotted to her on the division as her own absolute property.

In 1883 and 1884, M sold the suit village to the predecessor in title of the respondents. H admittedly knew of the sale at the time, but she made no objection to it inasmuch as she had control over the property allotted to her on the division.

On the death of M in 1912, H instituted a suit for the recovery of the suit village on the ground that it had been the property of her father, and that she had become entitled to possession of it as his sole heir on the death of her mother and sisters.

Held that, having regard to the arrangement of 1875 and to the events which had happened, it was not open to H to dispute the respondent's title to the suit village.

From the time of the arrangement of 1875 until the commencement of this suit, that is to say, for a period of 38 years, all the parties to the arrangement, including the plaintiff, dealt as absolute owners with the property allotted to them; and to this, with trifling exceptions, no objection was taken by the other parties to the division. In these circumstances the true inference appears to their Lordships to be that, at a time when P was claiming to be absolutely entitled to the property in her possession, and when her rights and those of her daughters were in doubt, the members of the family agreed and arranged among themselves that the whole property should be at once divided among the daughters and their sons then living, the mother surrendering her claims and each daughter accepting the property allotted to her in severalty in lieu of the undivided share in the whole estate which would have devolved upon her on her mother's death and abandoning her right of survivorship on the death of either of her sisters. H who was a party to the arrangement is at all events bound by her own agreement; and she cannot now be allowed to repudiate the agreement and to impeach a sale which was made on the faith of it.

In the case in L. R. 35 I. The decision of this Board did no more than establish that that proposition was not accurate, and that it was possible by the use of words of sufficient amplitude to convey in the terms of the gift the fullest rights of ownership, including, of course, the power to alienate, which the High Court had thought required to be added by express declaration. In that case it is true that there is some comparison drawn between the gift to a widow and gift to a person not under disability, but that was not the foundation of the decision, which depended entirely upon the wide meaning attributed to the words in which the gift to the widow was clothed. More recent decisions of this Board do nothing but repeat this same proposition in other words (135). (Lord Buckmaster). RAMACHANDRA RAO v. RAMACHANDRA RAO.

The texts which restrict a woman's power of disposition over immovable property given to her by her husband in his lifetime are different from those which both restrict her power over immovable property inherited from her husband, and regulate the course of its devolution. To the former class belong the text of Narada : " Property given to her by her husband through pure affection, she may enjoy at her pleasure after his death, or may give it away, except land or houses"; and the text of Katyayana : " What a woman has received as a gift from her husband, she may dispose of at pleasure after his death; if it be moveable; but as long as she lives, let her preserve it with frugality." To the second class belongs the text of Katyayana : "The childless widow preserving inviolate the bed of her Lord, and strictly obedient to her spiritual parents, may frugally enjoy the estate or property until she die; after her the legal heirs shall take it." The latter text includes both moveable and immovable property (510-1). (Sir James W. Colvile). BHUGWANDEEN DOOBEY v. MYNA BAEE.

DEBT OF—(Contd.).

The bond, which was expressed to be made by the Ranis, began by declaring that, the Raja having had monetary dealings with one G, the banker, the proprietor of the firm which was there mentioned, " we," that is, the Ranis, " also entered into similar dealings with the firm of the said Mahant ; that the whole of the principal debt and interest, consisting of certain unpaid items of previous dealings, and the loan we took on the occasions of the marriage and the 'Muklawa' ceremony of the Bibi Sahiba having been balanced, the sum of Rs. 16,960-10-6 has been found due by us up to the present date ; that we are at present unable to pay up the said sum in consequence of our estates being under the management of the Government, along with those of the Raja for the liquidation of the debts of the bankers."

Held that the bond on the face of it was inconsistent with a claim against the Ranis as sureties (98-9).

This bond commences with stating that there had been transactions between the bankers and the Raja, and that the Ranis had similar dealings, drawing, therefore, a distinction between the dealings of the bankers with the Raja on the one hand, and dealings of the same bankers with the Ranis on the other hand. It also draws a distinction between the estates of the Ranis and the estate of the Raja. Therefore, it appears to their Lordships that, upon the construction of this bond, it cannot be successfully contended that, where the words " we " or " us " are used, those words must be considered as including the Ranis and the Raja, because there is throughout the bond the distinction drawn between the dealings of the Raja and the dealings of Ranis, between the Ranis personally and the Raja, and between the estates of the Ranis and the estate of the Raja (99). The suit was brought against the widows of a deceased Raja, the plaint expressly stating that the claim was founded or based upon a bond which was therein mentioned. The plaint stated expressly that the debt was a debt due from the Raja himself, consequently that it was not a debt due from the Ranis, but from the Raja himself. Therefore the claim against the Ranis was in the nature of a claim against sureties.

The evidence did not show, but, so far as it went, tended to disprove that the Ranis were informed of the circumstances attending the debt, which was alleged in the plaint as being the Raja's debt, or that they were informed of the transactions before the collectors, which raised a question as to the continued existence of the alleged debt. All that the evidence showed was, that the bond in question was taken into the zenana, and was brought out again executed, or stated to have been executed by them.

Held, that under the circumstances the claim, in the nature of a claim against sureties, could not be established against the Ranis (99). (Sir Lawrance Peel.) MAHANT JAYRAM GIR v. RANI SHIVRAJ KOER.

———Basis and purpose of.

It is not merely for the protection of the material interests of her husband's relations that the fetter on the widow's power of alienation is imposed. Numberless authorities, from Menu downwards, may be cited to show that, according to the principles of Hindu Law, the proper state of every woman is one of tutelage; that they always require protection and are never fit for independence. The authority of Menu is cited for the proposition that, if a woman have no other controller or protector, the king should control or protect her. Again, all the authorities concur in showing that, according to the principles of Hindu Law, the life of a widow is to be one of ascetic privation. Hence, probably, it gave her a power of disposition for religious, which it denied to her for other, purposes (551-2). The reasons for the restrictions which the Hindu law imposes on the widow's dominion over her inheritance from her husband, whether founded on her natural dependence on others, her duty to lead an ascetic life, or on the impolicy of allowing the wealth of one family to pass to another, are as applicable to personal property invested so as to yield an income as they are to land. A widow's disabilities under the Hindu Law depend in a great measure upon the notions which the Hindu legislators entertained of the infirmity and necessary dependence of the sex. NATURE AND INCIDENTS OF.

———[See also HINDU LAW—WIDOW—INHERITANCE TO HUSBAND—ESTATE GOT BY (1) ALIENATION OF AND (2) ENJOYMENT OF.]

———Under the Hindu Law the widow, though she takes as heir, takes a special and qualified estate. Compared with any estate that passes under the English law by inheritance, it is an anomalous estate. It is a qualified proprietorship, and it is only by the principles of the Hindu law that the extent and nature of the qualification can be determined (550). (Lord Justice Turner.) COLLECTOR OF MASULIPATAM v. CAVALY VENKATA NARRAINAPAH. (1861) 8 M. I. A. 529 = 2 W. R. 61 = 1 Suth. 476 = 1 Sar. 820.

———Where a Hindu widow succeeds to the estate of her husband, the whole estate is for the time vested in her, absolutely for some purposes, though, in some respects, for a qualified interest; and, until her death it cannot be ascertained who will be entitled to succeed (604). (Lord Justice Turner.) KATAMA NACHIAR v. THE RAJAH OF SHIVAGANGA. (1863) 9 M. I. A. 539 = 2 W. R. C. R. P. C. 31 = 1 Suth. 520 = 2 Sar. 25.

———According to the Hindu law, a widow, who succeeds to the estate of her husband in default of male issue, whether she succeeds by inheritance or survivorship, does not take a mere life estate in the property. The whole estate is for the time vested in her absolutely for some purposes, though in some respects for only a qualified interest. Her estate is an anomalous one, and has been compared to that of a tenant in tail. It would perhaps be more correct to say that she holds an estate of inheritance to herself and the heirs of her husband. But, whatever her estate is, it is clear that, until the termination of it, it is impossible to say who are the persons who will be entitled to succeed as heirs to her husband. The succession does not open to the heirs of the husband until the termination of the widow's estate. Upon the termination of that estate the property descends to those who would have been the heirs of the husband if he had lived up to and died at the moment of her death (154).

The widow may by law hold the estate without performing the necessary religious ceremonies for her husband, and she may give, sell, or transfer the estate to another for her own life, or in case of necessity sell or mortgage the whole interest in it (146, 155). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) MONIRAM KOLITA v. KERRY KOLITANY. (1880) 7 I.A. 115 = 5 C. 776 (789-90) = 6 C.L.R. 322 = 4 Sar. 103 = 3 Suth. 765.

———Reasoning from the general notion of the Hindu commentators, touching the frailty and incapacity of women and the necessity for their dependence upon and control by some male protector; and, from the origin and nature of a widow's interest in the property which she takes in succession to her husband, the learned judge (Mitter, J.) arrived at the conclusion that she is, as he expresses it, "a trustee for the benefit of her husband's soul;" that inasmuch as, by reason of unchastity subsequent to her husband's death, she becomes incapable of performing effectually the religious services that are essential to his spiritual welfare, she ceases to be capable of performing her trust, and must therefore be taken to have broken the condition on which she holds the property, and to have incurred the forfeiture of her estate. Their Lordships entirely concur with the Chief Justice and the majority of the judges in rejecting the somewhat fanciful analogy of trusteeship (145). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) MONIRAM KOLITA v. KERRY KOLITANY.

———A Hindu widow is not a tenant for life but is owner of her husband's property subject to certain restrictions on alienation and subject to its devolving on her husband's heirs (91-2). (Lord Davey.) BIJOY GOPAL MUKERJI v. KRISHNA MAHISHI DEBI. (1907) 34 I.A. 87 = 34 C. 329 (333) = 2 M.L.T. 133 = 5 C.L.J. 334 = 11 C.W N. 424 = 9 Bom.L.R. 602 = 4 A.L.J. 329 = 9 Sar. 216 = 17 M.L J. 154.

———It is not quite accurate to describe the interest which a widow normally takes in immoveable property, which her husband inherits and leaves at his death, as a "life-estate." It would be just as untrue to speak of the estate of a father under the Mithakshara law as one for life.

Hindu Law knows nothing of estates for life or in tail or in fee. It measures estates not by duration but by use. The restrictions upon the use of an estate inherited by a woman are similar in kind to those which limit the powers of a male holder but different in degree. The distinctive feature of the estate is that at her death it reverts to the heirs of the last male owner. Her estate is not a life estate, because, under certain circumstances, she can give an absolute and complete title. Nor is it in any sense an estate held in trust for the reversioners. Within the limits imposed upon her, the female holder has the most absolute powers of enjoyment. (Lord Atkinson.) VASONJI MORARJI v. CHANDA BIBI (1915) 37 A. 369 (378-9) = 19 C. W. ———The rule of the Hindu Law with regard to the nature of a widow's estate may have been subject to various forms of expression, but in substance it is not doubtful. Her right is of the nature of a right of property; her position is that of owner; her powers in that character are, however, limited; but so long as she is alive no one has any vested interest in the succession (209). SETTLEMENT OFFICER'S ORDER CONFERRING PROPRIETARY RIGHT ON WIDOW IN—ESTATE TAKEN UNDER.

———Widow's estate or absolute estate.

R, the proprietor of a taluka named Bamhni, died on 23—10—1863, without issue leaving behind him a mother and three widows. On 16—2—1864 the Settlement Officer made an order conferring the proprietary rights of Mouza Bamhni in equal shares of four annas each on the three widows and the mother of R, and directing the issue of a rubkar to the Tahsildar for information and the issue of the orders for the information of the proprietors.

The question was whether the effect of the order of the Settlement Officer was to give the three widows of R only the widow's estate, or whether the order was one effecting a partition of the family property, and giving one-fourth in absolute proprietorship to each of the three widows, and the remaining share to the mother of the deceased.

Held that upon the face of that order no intention could be found to give to the mother and widows between them anything more than an interest in the widow's estate (250).

There may be words in this order about which there is some ambiguity, but reading the order as a whole their Lordships cannot doubt that the Settlement Officer took R as being the proprietor of the estate, and took the estate as having passed to his heirs upon his death. Why he attributed a fourth to the mother of R does not appear, but no doubt she was entitled to maintenance; and it may have been that that state of things before him at that time led him to believe that it would be a proper way of dealing with the estate to give each of the four who had claims upon it the enjoyment of one-fourth of the estate. That may be so (250). (Lord Hobhouse.) MUNNALAL CHAODRI v. GAJRAJ SINGH. (1889) 17 C. 246=5 Sar 452.

Widow—Inheritance to husband—Right of.

———Basis of—Spiritual benefit—Capacity to confer—Survivorship.

There are two principles on which the rule of succession according to the Hindu law appears to depend: the first is that which determines the right to offer the funeral oblation and the degree in which the person making the offering is supposed to minister to the spiritual benefit of the deceased; the other is an assumed right of survivorship. Most of the authorities rest the uncontested right of widows to inherit the estates of their husbands, dying separated from their kindred, on the first of these principles. But some ancient authorities also invoke the other principle. Now if the first of those principles were the only one involved, it would not be easy to see why the widow's right of inheritance should not extend to her husband's share in an undivided estate. For it is upon this principle that she is preferred to his divided brothers in the succession to a separate estate. But it is perfectly intelligible that upon the principle of survivorship the right of the coparceners in an undivided estate should overrule the widow's right of succession, whether based upon the spiritual doctrine, or upon the doctrine of survivorship. It is, therefore, on the principle of survivorship that the qualification of the widow's right established by the Mitakshara, whatever be its extent, must be taken to depend. If this be so, the rule ought not in a doubtful case, and in the absence of positive authority, to be extended beyond the reasons for it (610-1). N.B.—In the case before their Lordships, the widow had never been degraded or deprived of caste (156).

The text of Vrihat Menu cited in verse 7, S. 1, Ch. XI of Mr. Colebrooke's translation of the Dayabhaga, and that of Catyayana cited in Verse 56 of the same section and Chapter, do not, either expressly or by necessary implication, affirm the doctrime that the estate of a widow, once vested, is liable to forfeiture by reason of unchastity subsequent to the death of her husband (153).

It has not been established that the estate of a widow forms an exception to the general rule of Hindu law, that an estate once vested by succession or inheritance is not divested by any act which, before succession or incapacity, would have formed a ground for exclusion of inheritance (153).

A Hindu widow sued to recover her share, as heiress to her husband, in certain family property of which she claimed a portion in her absolute right, and a portion as one of the joint shebaits of certain idols. Among other properties plaintiff claimed one-fifth share in a talook, not as a debutter property, but, in right of her husband, as her absolute property. The Sub-Judge found that that share was in fact the property of a certain idol, and, therefore, he held that she had not maintained the allegation in her plaint. It was contended for her that, although she had failed to prove an absolute right in that property, still she was entitled in her right of joint shebait to a share of the property of the idol; but the Sub-Judge held that, as she had not framed her plaint in that way, and had not sued as Shebait, she could not recover in that capacity, and, therefore, he decided against her upon that point.

On appeal the High Court decided that she was entitled to claim the one-fifth share in the talook as Shebait observing that, although perhaps by a strict construction of the declaration, she might be held not to have expressed her claim to it properly, nevertheless, that was an objection rather of form than of substance, and that looking to the whole case, and considering that the evidence of both parties was gone into, the justice of the case required that they should give her that relief.

Held that the High Court was right in treating the objection which had been made to the reception of that claim by the Sub-Judge as an objection rather of form than of substance, and in giving her the relief which she prayed

The cause of action arose in the refusal of the surviving brothers to recognise the right of the widow to succeed to her deceased husband's share in the family property under a partition which had not been completed by actual division at the time of her husband's death; and it would be a denial of justice to hold that in a suit upon such a cause of action relief could not be given in respect to moveable as well as to immoveable property. Except possibly in the extreme case of a widow being kept under circumstances of extreme penury and oppression, a widow is not entitled to arrears of maintenance from the date of her husband's death and including the time that she resided in her husband's establishment and accepted maintenance in fact and in kind from her husband's relations. To give her arrears only from the date of the decree would be an inadequate recognition of her right to maintenance. It is indeed an inversion of the correct procedure in the case of a continuing right. In any view the right could not be post-dated from the institution of the suit onwards. This, besides being erroneous in law, would be a daily temptation to delay in litigation by posptoning the date of liability to that of final decree. When a widow's receipt of maintenance in her husband's establishment does not cease contemporaneously with her institution of a suit for maintenance, it is the duty of the Court to consider the whole circumstances of the situation in pronouncing a decree for arrears.

In a suit by a Hindu widow for maintenance, the Courts below found that the then net income of the estate was a certain amount, and awarded the widow maintenance at a certain rate on the basis thereof. They also found that two large items of the estate, which were not taken into account in arriving at the net income, were the subject-matters of two suits by and against the estate, and if those litigations ended favourably to the estate, its net income would be substantially increased. The High Court, by its decree, accordingly reserved liberty to the widow to apply in her suit itself for enhancement of maintenance in the event of the said litigations ending favourably to the estate, and decided that a fresh suit for the purpose would not be necessary.

In a suit by the plaintiffs to assert their rights as widow and daughter, respectively, of a Cutchee Memon, the main contest in the courts below was as to whether the 1st plaintiff was a nika wife of the deceased and 2nd the issue of that nika marriage. That point was decided in favour of the plaintiffs by the courts below, and their decision was affirmed by their Lordships.

At the trial, however, questions were put and disallowed, which went to show that the 1st plaintiff had been unchaste after the death of her husband and had thus (as the defendants contended) disentitled herself to maintenance. On the record as it stood, the defendants had neither averment nor issue of such unchastity, and all that they could point to was their denial that "the plaintiffs" were entitled to maintenance, and the fifth issue, whether "the plaintiffs are entitled in any event to maintenance or marriage expenses."

Held, that those general words, equally applicable to mother and child, were entirely unsuitable for the statement of the specific act of incontinence on the part of the mother, and that the defendants could not, therefore, be allowed to raise the plea that the mother forfeited her right to maintenance after the death of her husband by reason of unchastity (129). A Hindu widow does not lose her right to maintenance by reason of her leaving her husband's house, provided she does not leave for the purposes of unchastity, or for any other improper purpose.

A Hindu widow is not bound to reside with the relatives of her husband; the relatives of her husband have no right to compel her to live with them; and she does not forfeit her right to property or maintenance merely on account of her going and residing with her family or leaving her husband's residence from any other cause than unchaste or improper purposes (206). ———Circumstances affecting—Non-residence in husband's dwelling-house if one.

While holding that a widow who resided apart from her husband's family did not, according to the custom pleaded in the case, forfeit her right to maintenance, their Lordships seemed to be of opinion that her residence apart from her husband's dwelling-house ought not to throw an unfair burden on the person on whom the duty of maintaining her was cast (436). ———Data for fixing—Principles on which, to be fixed.

The amount of maintenance should be fixed with reference to the proprietor's estate (211).

In the case before their Lordships the deceased husband left property to the extent of two lakhs of rupees, or £20,000 a year. He left four widows, the plaintiff being the fourth or youngest of the four. In a suit for maintenance by her against the adopted son of the deceased, the Sub-Judge awarded her the sum of Rs. 150 a month. On appeal the High Court, thought that, having regard to the amount of the husband's property, the widow was entitled to a larger sum; and they awarded her maintenance at the rate of Rs. 200 a month.

Held, affirming the High Court, that it did not appear to be excessive, even though the deceased left 4 widows, that each of those widows should have at the rate of Rs. 200 a month, equal to £240 a year (210-1.)

Looking to the state in which a Hindu widow is bound to live and the religious duties which she is called upon to perform, it does not appear to their Lordships, having reference to the property of the deceased husband; that this widow ought to receive a less sum than that which has been awarded to her by the High Court, namely, Rs.200 a month (211). (Sir Barnes Peacock.) RAJAH PIRTHEE SINGH v. RANEE RAJ KOWER. (1873) Sup. I. A. 203 (211) = 12 B.L.R. 238 = 20 W.R. 21 = 3 Sar. 259 = 2 Suth. 846.

———In determining the amount of maintenance to which a Hindu widow is entitled one element to be considered is the value of the estate. Another element is the position and status of the deceased husband and of the widow. The main subject of inquiry will be the value of the estate, and the question for the Court to consider will be the due proportion which should be given to the widow out of it for her proper maintenance including not only the ordinary expenses of living, but that which she might reasonably expend for religious and other duties incident to the station in life which she might occupy (56-7). Some of the other circumstances which the Court may properly take into account, not as conclusive upon the amount which ought to be awarded, but as affording some guide to the proper amount which the person from whom the maintenance is demanded offered to pay, are the amount which the widows' husband intended to give to her by will, which, however, was never executed (57-9). condition and necessities and rights of the members, on a reasonable view of change of circumstances possibly required in the future, regard being, of course, had to the scale and mode of living, and to the age, habits, wants, and class of life of the parties. In short, it is out of a great category of circumstances, small in themselves, that a safe and reasonable induction is to be made by a Court of Law in arriving at a fixed sum.

Ordinarily such sum should be fixed for a widow's maintenance as would enable her to live as far as might be consistently with the position of a widow in something like the same degree of comfort and with the same reasonable luxury of life as she had in her husband's lifetime. The principle of assessing the maintenance might be different in cases in which the past mode of life of the widow has been demonstrably on a penurious and miserly scale or on a quite extravagant scale having regard to the total income of the husband. widow of the testator did not disentitle herself to maintenance by separating from the son and living apart from him.

It is argued that it was made a condition of the will to entitle her to maintenance that she should reside under the same roof and in joint family with the eldest son. Their Lordships, however, think that no such condition is to be found in the will, and that she was to be left in this respect in the ordinary position of a Hindu widow, in which case separation from the ancestral house would not generally disentitle her to maintenance suitable to her rank and condition (119). Because a reversioner or the Crown taking the property of a deceased Hindu by escheat has the right to demand proof that a charge claimed against the estate was a charge on the estate by the act of the widow, and that the debt charged was of a particular character, it does not follow that the ordinary rule, which requires the party who alleges payment to prove payment, is to be inverted in favour of the reversioner or the Crown, or that the debt is to be presumed to be satisfied unless the contrary is shown by the creditor. If, indeed, the facts showed a strong probability of the satisfaction of the debt by the proper application of the surplus revenue of the estate by the widow, the court might be justified in pressing against the creditor the non-production of accounts, or of other satisfactory proof that the debt had not been so satisfied. The Court might legitimately hold that the facts establishing that probability afforded prima facie evidence of payment. ———Failure to appropriate—Deduction of that amount from money owing to mortgagee under mortgage.

The reason of the rule that a person, who lends money to a Hindu widow after due inquiry as to the existence of a necessity for the loan is not bound to see to the application of the money, is that the purposes for which a loan is wanted are often future, as respects the actual application, and the lender can rarely have, unless he enters upon the management, the means of controlling and rightly directing the actual application. That rule has no application to a case where the lender has the control and actual application of the money. Having that control and application he is bound to see that the money is properly applied (5).

The suit was to recover a large sum of money which the plaintiff had advanced to the 1st defendant, a Hindu widow, from time to time, and which, except as to a very small portion of the claim, was secured by mortgages upon her husband's property granted by the 1st defendant. The question was whether a sum of Rs. 10,000, which had been found by the Courts below to have been received by the plaintiff's principal man of business on account of the ijara rent due to the estate, ought to be deducted from the suit claim.

Held that the plaintiff ought to have seen that that sum of Rs. 10,000 was applied in reduction of the debt for which the estate was liable, and that the judgment of the High Court was right in deducting the whole of that sum (4-5.) A plea of no legal necessity for a loan and that the property is not at all liable for the payment of the amount claimed opens the door for a defendant to say that the rate of interest is excessive and places on the plaintiff the onus of proving that the rate of interest is not excessive, having regard to all the circumstances which prevailed when the loan was made. In a suit to enforce a mortgage by a Hindu widow of her husband's estate, held that the onus was on the lender to prove not only that there was necessity for the loan but that the necessity included borrowing on such terms as were provided for by the mortgage bond.

Held further that, as in all questions of onus, a certain amount of evidence might cause the onus to shift, and that evidence on the lender's part that the money could not, in the circumstances, have been raised at less interest would suffice to shift the onus so that, if the defendant led no evidence to controvert that statement, the lender would prevail, but that when there was no evidence and it was evident on the face of the document that the interest charged was far in excess of commercial rates, then undoubtedly the lender had not discharged his task. In a suit to enforce a mortgage bond executed by a Hindu widow, the plaintiff prayed for an absolute decree for the sale of the property alleged to have been mortgaged, including the reversionary interest therein. There was hardly any evidence on the part of the plaintiff to shew what negotiations took place with him, and what representations induced him to advance the money ; still less was there any proof that, having those representations before him, he made the necessary and proper inquiries. The evidence adduced by him was consistent with this state of things ; that the widow's servants, the dewans, chiefly managed her affairs ; that if they had immediate occasion for a sum of money they might have gone to the plaintiff's kooti and got a temporary loan.

Held, that the evidence failed to prove a necessity so serious as would justify a pledge of her husband's estate in excess of the ordinary powers of a Hindu widow, or reasonable grounds for the belief of such necessity (12-3). A mortgage of her husband's estate made by a Hindu widow by a bond of December 1877 was found not to have been made for purposes binding on the estate of her deceased husband. It was, however, contended for the mortgagee that that mortgage bond was binding on the estate because it was confirmed by a bond of 1881 executed by the daughter of the last male owner, his widow having died in the interval ,and by the son of that daughter then of age in favour of the mortgagees. The alleged admission of the bond of December 2, 1877 was contained only in the statement in the bond of 1881 that the creditors had no deed except the bonds of May 25, 1877, and December 2, 1877 "which are payable." It was found that the nature and effect of the bond of 1881, or of the admission of liability for past debts contained in that bond, were never explained to or properly appreciated by either the daughter or her son.

Held, affirming the High Court, that under such circumstances the alleged admission was of no avail to the mortgagee (192-194). (Lord Davey.) SHAM SUNDER LAL v. ACHHAN KUNWAR. (1898) 25 I. A, 183= 21 A. 71 (83-4, 85)=2 C. W. N. 729=7 Sar. 417.

A, a Hindu widow, who had inherited the estate of her deceased husband, incurred debts to the appellant, and, on 1-3 1872, she executed a bond to him for a stated sum, to meet the amount of her liability, and thereby hypothecated certain mouzahs appertaining to her husband's estate. On 31-8-1872, an agreement was entered into between the widow and R, the presumptive reversionary heir of her husband, whereby she surrendered her interest in her husband's estate to R, upon condition that he was to pay her an allowance of Rs. 24,000 for her maintenance, and was to pay off her liabilities. On 31-3-1876, the appellant instituted a suit on the bond against the widow, A, and R. R was joined as a defendant upon the ground that the widow, A, had, under the agreement of 1872, given over to him the whole of her properties, including what was mortgaged by the bond, but no relief was claimed against him personally.

Held, that it was clearly competent for the appellant to allege in that suit the personal liability of R for the amount of the bond (237).

The appellant relied upon the fact of the mortgage being one affecting the whole estate; but he could also have alleged that R was bound at all events to pay him, in consequence of the agreement which he had entered into with the widow (237). Held that, in such a case, whatever might be the precise degree of proof required from those who relied upon the mortgage, there was no doubt that those who took such a security from a person, having only a limited power to grant it, were bound to show, prima facie at least, that the money was raised for a legitimate purpose (199).

Held further, on the evidence, that the mortgagee had failed to show that the mortgage was given in any part for the purposes, for which the widow was entitled to pledge the estate (202). Immoveable property, obtained by a Hindu widow on partition of the joint family property under the Mithakshara Law, is not part of her stridhan in the narrow sense of that word, indicating her separate property or peculium which passes on her death to her own heirs, but reverts on her death to the next heirs of her husband. Of course, the members of a joint family effecting a partition may agree that a portion of the property shall be transferred to the widow by way of absolute gift, as part of her stridhan, so as to constitute a provision for her stridhan heirs; but, in the absence of any such intention, their Lordships do not feel justified in putting property acquired by a widow, on a partition of the joint estate, upon a footing different from that on which property coming to her by way of inheritance has been placed (131). ———Presumption—Onus of Proof.

It was alleged that when a widow is found in possession of property, of the acquisition of which no account is given, and it is shown that her husband died possessed of considerable property, then there is a presumption of law that the property found in the widow's possession was originally that of her husband. Widow—Release in favour of female presumptive reversioner by.

———Effect of.

Two Hindu widows, who had inherited the estate of their husband, B, executed a deed in favour of D, his daughter by one of them, whereby, after stating that with the exeception of D, there was no heir of their husband or of themselves, they made a gift to her of certain lands and villages, only retaining to themselves a life interest in part of them.

In a suit by the plaintiffs, the presumptive heirs of B, subject to the interest of the widows, for a decision that the deed of gift in favour of D was null and void as regards the reversionary interests of the plaintiffs, it was contended by the widows and the daughter of D, who had died in the interval, that if a widow released her interest to her husband's heir presumptive, which D, was at the time of the said gift, the absolute interest became at once vested in such heir, and therefore the inheritance devolved on the daughter of D.

The Sub-Judge held that the conveyance to D, did not vest the inheritance in her, because she was heir only to a woman's estate, and the prescribed course of inheritance would be changed if she took an estate transmissible to her own heirs. The High Court, on appeal, did not express any opinion adverse to that of the Sub-Judge.

Their Lordships concurred with the Sub-Judge (157). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse.) ISRI DUT KOER v. MUSSUMUT HANSBUTH KOERAIN. (1883) 10 I. A. 150 = 10 C. 324 (334) = 13 C. L. R. 418 = 4 Sar. 459.

Widow—Revenue due upon estate—Wilful default to pay.

———Mortgaged property—Revenue due upon—Mortgagee paying—Remedy of.

A Hindu widow, who was in possession as her husband's heiress of property mortgaged by him to a third party, wilfully defaulted to pay the revenue due to the Government for the same. The mortgagee paid off the arrears to avert a sale of the property for the said arrears under Act I of 1845.

Held, that in such a case the proper course for the mortgagee was to institute a suit, making the reversioners also parties to it, to have an additional charge declared in his favour on the mortgaged property, subject to redemption, and seeking a sale only in default of redemption (267-8).

The reversioners are entitled to recoup out of the widow's life profits, the money which is advanced to avert a sale, if they redeem, as they are entitled to do, the actual salvors; and it would be obviously inequitable for a person with such knowledge of the dealings of the proprietress, determining to salve the estate, to seek indirectly its destruction by a sale of the whole estate under an ordinary execution, without giving the reversioners the means of protecting their interests (267-8). HUSBAND'S DEBTS PAID OFF BY WIDOW DURING HIS LIFETIME—SALE FOR DISCHARGE OF.

———Validity of—No evidence of obligation on husband's part to re-pay—Effect.

The respondents (plaintiffs) sued to recover from the appellant (defendant) certain property in her possession which the plaintiffs alleged had originally belonged to their maternal grandfather and which they alleged had been sold by their maternal grandmother without legal necessity to the vendor of the appellant. It appeared that the plaintiff's grandmother had, during the lifetime of her husband, paid off certain debts of her husband, and that the sale impeached was made for the discharge of the said debts. There was, however, no evidence to show that there was any obligation on the part of the plaintiff's grandfather or his estate to pay the moneys which were paid by his wife.

Held, that the obligation lay upon the appellant to prove that there was any obligation on the part of the grandfather or his estate to pay the moneys which were paid by his wife, and that, the appellant not having adduced any such evidence, the sale was rightly held not to be binding upon the plaintiffs. ———Compensation for—Measure of—Enhancement of property as marketable subject—Execution of temple on it.

The suit was to recover possession of a house and compound in Delhi. The plaintiff claimed the said house and compound as the daughter's son of the last male owner thereof. On the death of the last male owner his widow succeeded to his estate for the usual life tenure of a Hindu widow ; and she, by a deed of sale, conveyed her interest in the suit property to the father of the appellant. The question was as to the amount payable by the plaintiff to the appellant as compensation for improvements as a condition of taking possession of the house and compound.

It appeared that in the course of the possession of the last holder a temple was erected upon the ground, and other expenditure was incurred to a considerable amount. The Court below assessed the sum of Rs. 1,400 as a fair sum to the extent of which the property, as a vendible subject, had been enhanced in value by the operations of the last holder.

Held, that the grounds upon which the Court below proceeded were sound (564).

In such a case it is always to be borne in mind that the amount of the expenditure made has occasionally very little to do with the real issue ; and that that issue is, to what extent has enhancement of the subject been produced ? Their Lordships agree with the Court below in thinking that it has been produced to the extent of Rs. 1,400. But with regard to the difference between that sum and the Rs. 7,000 claimed, a large part of that difference stands to the account of the erection of the temple upon the land. The erection of the temple would not of itself add to the selling value of the property, and the real question is, was the property, as a marketable subject, enhanced in value or not ? (564). ———Compensation for—Right to—Purchaser from purchaser in possession at date of decree for possession—Right of.

In a case in which compensation was claimed in respect of improvements executed on property purchased from a Hindu widow, it was argued that an allowance could nor be made because the improvements had in fact been executed by the person who had been the original purchaser from the widow, and that he had again sold and that it was the purchaser from him who was in possession at the time of the decree for possession of the property.

Held, that there was no substance in the contention.

The increased rent that is properly attributable to the improvements can be properly set off against the mesne profits, even although it was not actually executed by the person in possession at the moment when the decree for possession was made. INTEREST AWARDED BY DECREE—SALE TO DECREE-HOLDER IN DISCHARGE OF—VALIDITY OF—DISALLOWANCE OF INTEREST SUBSEQUENTLY ON APPEAL.

———Effect—Sale to stranger to avert execution of decree of Court below in such a case—Distinction.

A mortgage decree was passed against one K. The decree disallowed interest subsequent to the decree. In proceedings taken to execute the decree the executing Court, however, passed an order, also during K's lifetime, allowing interest subsequent to the decree. That order was ultimately set aside on appeal on the ground that the executing Court had no power to alter or to add to the decree. During the interval K died, and his widow, who succeeded to a Hindu widow's estate in his property, executed a sale-deed in favour of the decree-holder conveying property appertaining to the estate. One of the items of consideration for the sale was the amount representing interest subsequent to the above-mentioned decree which was allowed by the Court executing the decree but disallowed on appeal.

Held that the sale, in so far as it was for the interest subsequent to the decree, was not justified by necessity (77).

Quaere what the result would have been if some outsider had advanced money to the widow in order to protect the estate against a claim by the decree-holder to realize the interest awarded to him by the Court executing the decree (77). executants had jointly and severally agreed to sell and convey all their full and existing rights in the property sold to the purchaser for a sum to be paid in cash, and that P joined as an executant by virtue of her position in the family for the additional guarantee of the vendee. By the operative granting part of the deed R in the first place sold, conveyed, and transferred all the rights and interest in the property to the purchaser without any reservation. Then P transferred to him her only right in the property, namely, her right to maintenance. And then the two ladies jointly proceeded to sell and convey to him all their own existing right, title, and interest in, or belonging or appertaining to the property, and declared that from the execution of the deed thenceforth the purchaser should be—"the full owner and proprietor of the said houses" (the property sold) "in our stead, and shall own, possess, and enjoy them in the same way as we have been hitherto doing." Then there followed two very significant provisions, first that—"as proof of the existing debts and the necessity of conveying the property for purposes aforesaid S" (the husband of the respondent, the only daughter of K) "has signed as one of the witnesses of the deed," and secondly, that—"should at any time the said vendee or his heirs and representatives be deprived of whole or part of the property conveyed by the deed he or they would be entitled to recover the money in full or in part, as the case may be, from us and rest of our property."

While not dissenting from the finding of the Sub-Judge that the existence of the debts incurred by the predecessors of K to the amount mentioned in the deed, the necessity for the sale of the absolute interest in the property conveyed in order to discharge them, and the payment of them out of the purchase money when obtained, were clearly established, the High Court nevertheless held that the terms of the deed were inadequate to convey to the purchaser anything beyond R's own interest in the same, which they described as a life-interest. They held so, relying upon the following passages of the granting part of the deed, first:—

"I, the said R, do hereby convey, sell, and transfer all my rights and interest in the said houses" (the property sold) "which I inherited from my deceased husband, K."

And secondly.—

"We . . . sell all our existing rights, title, and interest."

Held, reversing the High Court, that by the deed the absolute interest in the property sold was conveyed to the vendee, and not merely the life interest of the widow, R, (379). The Courts below found that out of the said sum of Rs. 5,300, a sum of Rs. 4,588-2-2 was employed by the widow in discharging debts binding upon the estate, and that to that extent there was a legal necessity for selling the moiety of the village. As to the balance of Rs. 711-13-10, the Sub-Judge was of

PRICE OF—FAIRNESS OF.

———Evidence of—Revenue Inspector's ex parte valuation years before for ascertaining stamp duty payable on deed relating to larger share—Value of.

The question was whether the price for which a Hindu widow sold in November 1897 a moriety of one-third share in a village, viz., the sum of Rs. 5,300, was a fair price. The Subordinate Judge, who came to the conclusion that Rs. 12,100 was the value of the moriety of the one-third share, was largely influenced in doing so by a valuation which was made in 1892 by a Revenue Inspector of the one-third share. That valuation was made by the Revenue Inspector for the purpose of ascertaining the stamp duty payable on a deed which related to that one-third share. The valuation was not a valuation of a moiety of the one-third share; it was a valuation of the whole one-third share, which the Revenue Inspector valued at Rs. 24,200. The Revenue Inspector in making that valuation was assisted by two local men, the Village Munsif and an assistant Kurnam. The Revenue Inspector valued each field, wet and dry, and each tree separately, with a total result of Rs. 24,200. That Revenue Inspector was not called as a witness, and there was nothing to explain on what principle he valued, but the two local men who assisted him said that the valuation was correct. It appeared, however, from their evidence that no one on behalf of the widow was present when the valuation was being made, and that neither of the local men nor the Revenue Inspector asked the owners for any account showing income and expenditure for the purpose of valuing the lands.

Held, agreeing with the High Court, that it would be easy to attach an exaggerated importance to the Revenue Inspector's valuation as a piece of evidence in the case (483) (Sir John Edge.) MEDAI DALAVOI THIRUMALAIYAPPA MUDALIAR v. NAINAR THEVAN. (1922) 16 L. moiety as a speculation. They in their turm sold the moiety bit by bit to the cultivating ryots among whom there was great competition to acquire lands suitable for cultivation for some Rs. 11,500. Although the defendants 3 and 4 bought the moiety as a speculation, the sale was a genuine and not a sham sale.

In a suit by the reversionary heir of the last male owner for a declaration that the sale by the widow was not binding on the reversion, held that, in ascertaining whether the sale was for a fair price or not, it was not proper to take into consideration the price which competing tenants might pay for the component parts calculated at a regular scale, and regard must be had to the fact that the circumstance that the vendor was a widow would tend rather to low values (prices) being obtained owing to the risk of litigation which intending purchasers might apprehend. The price at a private sale of a considerable extent of land purchased in lump would depend not so much on the valuation of its component parts, calculated on a regular scale, as on the need of the vendor for money and the competition for lands in that locality at the time of the sale. What was in question in the former suit was the right of pre-emption in respect of what the widow had power to convey and did convey, that is, her widow's interest, and the introduction of any question as to the effect of the conveyance upon the reversion would have been incongruous to the matter of the suit (77-8). The suit was to set aside a sale by a Hindu widow. At the time of the sale L was the nearest reversioner. He died after the death of the widow, leaving P, his son and heir. P transferred all his rights of inheritance in the properties sold by the widow to the plaintiff who instituted the suit to set aside the sale. The sale-deed sought to be set aside was executed by P as mookhtar of the widow under a mookhtarnama executed by her in his favour. By the sale-deed P did not purport to convey any other interest than that of the widow.

Held that, under the circumstances, S. 43 of the Transfer of Property Act could not be relied upon either against P or against the plaintiff (227).

P did not represent that he was authorised to transfer any other interest than that of his principal, the widow, and he did not profess to transfer any other (227). (Sir Richard Couch.) SYED NURUL HOSSEIN v. SHEOSAHAI.

During her lifetime a Hindu widow executed a mookhtarnama by which she appointed one P her general mookhtar, with power to alienate or sell any moveable or immoveable properties for any consideration. P executed a deed of sale by which he sold a portion of the property which the widow held as heiress of her husband absolutely. P was described in the deed of sale as "general mookhtar and executor under the will, dated 6-6-1853, and adopted son" of the widow "by virtue of a general power of attorney", and the deed contained the following passage:—"My client, the vendor, and her heirs and representatives, and I as mookhtar, who am the general mookhtar, adopted son, and executor under the will of the vendor, and my heirs, and representatives, have now no claim, right, demand, or contention in respect to the property sold and the said consideration money against the vendee and his heirs and representatives. I, as mookhtar, have made a general renunciation of the same. Such renunciation is legal and valid."

At the time of the widow's death L was the nearest reversionary heir. He died subsequently leaving P aforesaid as his heir. P executed a deed of release or conveyance in favour of the plaintiff of his (P's) right of inheritance to the parts of the estate of the widow's husband which had been sold by her. In a suit brought by the plaintiff to set aside the deed of sale aforesaid on the ground that it had not been executed for necessity. Held, that neither P, nor the plaintiff was estopped from disputing the validity of that sale (227).

There is no declaration or representation in the deed of sale on which an estoppel could be founded. The description of P, as general mookhtar and executor under the will, and adopted son of the widow was sufficient to put the purchaser on notice and to make it his duty to inquire as to what the widow had power to sell. There is no allusion in the deed to any right of P, as heir of the widow's husband, which he was not either then or when the widow died. The fair construction of the deed is that P, as agent, was only selling what his principal had power to sell. There is no representation that P was selling on his own account, and the plaintiff is not denying the truth of any fact which is represented in the deed. The words "and my heirs and representatives have now to claim, etc.," must be read with the context, and refer to the character of mookhtar. The transaction was the ordinary one of a sale by a Hindu widow, and there was not any representation by P, which would prevent the plaintiff from bringing the present suit (226-7). Held, that the interest of the grandson at the time of the execution of the deed was a mere expectancy, contingent, firstly, on his mother surviving the widow, and, secondly, on his surviving his mother, and that his association in the deed of sale was wholly futile and had no legal effect in validating the transaction if otherwise invalid. The plaintiff sued to set aside a sale by a Hindu widow on the ground that it was not made for necessity and was not valid beyond her lifetime. L was the nearest reversioner at the time of the widow's death and the plaintiff stated in his plaint that he was the heir of L, and so entitled to question the alienation. In fact, however, he was only a purchaser from P, the heir of L. The High Court found that the plaintiff was not the heir of L, but nevertheless found that the sale in question was not for necessity, and gave the plaintiff a decree for possession.

On appeal to the Privy Council the defendant contended that the plaintiff ought not to be allowed to change his ground for relief and could not succeed on the footing that he was only a purchaser from P, the heir of L.

Held, that the objection was not tenable (225-6).

The substance of the case in the plaint is that the sale by the widow was invalid beyond her interest in or power over the estate. The plaintiff had the right of the heir of L, and Widow—Surrender by.

———Acknowledged right—Admission that right did not exist—Deed of surrender drawn up on latter footing and not on former—Validity of surrender in case of—Transaction in substance effecting self-effacement by widow.

A Hindu widow can renounce the estate in favour of the nearest reversioner, and by a voluntary act efface herself from the succession as effectively as if she had then died. This voluntary self-effacement is sometimes referred to as a surrender, sometimes as a relinquishment or abandonment of her rights; and it may be effected by any process having that effect, provided that there is a bona fide and total renunciation of the widow's right to hold the property.

Upon the death of a Hindu in 1872 his nephew obtained a certificate under Act XXVII of 1860 as sole survivor of his joint family; the widow of the deceased opposed the application and alleged a partition in 1864. Instead of filing a suit, the widow, acting through her brother and attorney, accepted the decision and executed an agreement in 1874, agreeing, in consideration of certain property being allotted to her for maintenance during her life, not further to contest the matter. On the same day the nephew executed another agreement in similar terms whereby he secured the agreed maintenance to the widow during her life. In pursuance of those documents the nephew was forthwith let into possession of the whole property; and from the date of those documents until her death in 1904 the widow duly received the agreed maintenance without dispute or objection. The nephew died in 1894 and the estate passed under his will to the first appellant. In 1907 the respondent sued to recover the estate as heir to the holder who died in 1872 upon his widow's death, and proved that a partition had taken place in 1864. Held, that though the agreements of 1874 were drawn up on the footing not of a surrender of an acknowledged right, but of an admission that the right did not exist, in substance there was a complete self-effacement by the widow which precluded her from asserting any further claim to the estate; and that the execution of the agreements, followed by the acceptance for thirty years of maintenance under the terms thereof, amounted to a complete relinquishment by the widow of her estate in favour of the nephew, and accordingly that the title of the nephew's representatives was established, and plaintiff's suit should be dismissed. ———Bona fide surrender—Device to divide estate with reversioner—Evidence—Compromise of suit with next reversioner—Surrender by way of.

N, the succession to whose estate was governed by the Mithila law, died leaving a widow, 4 daughters, and an infant son, who died shortly after. After the death of the infant son, the daughters applied for letters of administration with the will annexed of the deceased father, under which will they took the immoveable property on failure of the son under burden of certain provisions to the widow. The application was opposed by M, who, upon the assumption that the will was inoperative, was the nearest reversioner according to Hindu law. Letters were, however, granted, whereupon M, sued for a declaration that the will was inoperative, and that, upon the death of the widow of N, the estate would devolve on the reversioner then entitled. That suit was compromised, and a decree was passed in terms of the compromise. By the compromise the rights under the will were given up; the moveable property, with the exception of certain animals and a small amount of grain, was given absolutely to the widow; the widow surrendered all right of succession to the immoveable property; the plaintiff (M) who by the surrender, became, as nearest reversioner, entitled to the immoveable property, made over half of that property to the daughters; and M and the daughters each gave a small portion of the land to the widow for maintenance. The necessary deeds to carry out the arrangement were executed and the parties went into possession in accordance with the arrangement.

Held that the compromise was a bona fide surrender of the whole estate, and not a mere device to divide the estate between the widow and M, the then nearest reversioner.

The widow was, under the Mithila law governing the family, absolutely entitled to the moveable property of her husband, and the compromise, in leaving that property with her or allowing the same to be retained by her, merely recognised her right to it. As regards the immovable property, in which she had only a widow's interest, the surrender was total, not partial. The conveyance of small portions of land to the widowed mother was unobjectionable, as it was only for maintenance. Further, the fact of the arrangement being a compromise of a dispute which had culminated in a litigation is also important as showing that the arrangement was a bona fide surrender and not a mere device to divide the estate with the reversioner (238-9). A Hindu died leaving behind him a widow, two daughters, and a grandson by one of them. The widow, who succeeded to the estate of her husband, executed in favour of the said grandson, then the apparent reversionary heir, an ikrarnamah which provided that she was to retain the estate for her life and that the said grandson was to enter upon the estate and enjoy the same after her death.

Held that the transaction did not amount to a valid surrender of the estate under the Hindu law, and that the said grandson did not, by virtue of the ikrarnama, acquire a valid title to the estate to the exclusion of other daughters' sons of the deceased subsequently born and alive at the date of the death of his widow (32-3).

The object of the widow in executing the ikrarnama was to declare the rights of the then existing grandson; she wished to leave the management in his hands, but not to surrender her life estate (33). ———Device to divide estate—What amounts to.

To make a surrender by a Hindu widow, with consent of the next heir (necessity being out of the question), a mere device to divide the estate with the reversioner, it is not necessary that the lady surrendering should take part of the property directly. ———Female presumptive heir—Release in favour of—Estate conveyed by.

A Hindu died leaving two widows and a daughter by one of them, but no male issue. The widows executed a deed whereby they made a gift to the daughter of certain lands and villages, only retaining to themselves a life interest in part of them. Some of the property was described as mouzahs exclusively acquired by the widows out of their own fund, and the rest was described as having been left by their husband.

In a suit by the presumptive heirs of the last male owner, subject to the interest of the widows, for a declaration that the deed of gift was null and void as regards the reversionary interests of the plaintiffs, the widows and the daughter's daughter (the daughter having died before) contended that the release by the widows of their interest to their husband's heir presumptive which the daughter was gave her an estate transmissible to her own heirs.

The Sub-Judge held that the conveyance to the daughter did not vest the inheritance in her, because she was heir only to a woman's estate, and the prescribed course of inheritance would be changed if she took an estate transmissible to her own heirs.

Their Lordships affirmed the Sub-Judge (157). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse). ISRI DUT KOER v. MUSSUMUT HANSBUTTI KOERAIN. (1883) 10 I.A. 150 = 10 C. 324 (334) = 13 C.L.R. 418 = 4 Sar. 459.

The High Court of Allahabad, indeed, does not recognise the validity of surrenders in favour, or alienations with the consent, of presumptive reversioners, so as to defeat the title of the actual reversioner at the time of the widow's death. ———Reversioner's right to question validity of—Mortgage by person to whom surrender made—Suit upon—Reversioner party to—Effect.

A Hindu mother, who had inherited the share of one of her sons, gave it up to her remaining sons in consideration of an annuity. The interest of the deceased derived by three of the remaining sons under the surrender by their mother was amongst other properties subsequently mortgaged. On the death of those three sons, the mother inherited their shares. In a suit to enforce the mortgages instituted against her, the sole surviving son was joined as a party as a reversioner, the mother dying during the pendency of the suit.

Held that the fact that the sole surviving son was a party to the mortgage suits would not preclude him from questioning the validity of the surrender and establishing such right to the share surrendered by her as he might have as a reversioner entitled to possession (267). (Sir John ———Validity of—Conditions.

According to Hindu law, a widow can accelerate the estate of the heir by conveying absolutely and destroying her life estate. But it is essentially necessary to withdraw her own life estate so that the whole estate should get vested at once in the grantee. The necessity of the removal of the obstacle of the life estate is a practical check on the frequency of such conveyances (32). (Lord Morris.) BEHARI LAL v. MADHO LAL AHIR GYAWAL.

———An alienation by a widow of her deceased husband's estate held by her may be validated if It can be shown to be a surrender of her whole interest in the whole estate in favour of the nearest reversioner or reversioners at the time of the alienatton. In such circumstances the question of necessity does not fall to be considered. But the surrender must be a bona fide surrender, not a device to divide the estate with the reversioner (84).

A partial surrender is invalid even if the surrender is to the nearest reversioner and absolute as to that part (80).

The principle on which the doctrine of surrender rests is the effacement of the widow—an effacement which in other circumstances is effected by actual death or by civil death—which opens the estate of the deceased husband to his next heirs at that date (80).

The surrender once exercised in favour of the nearest reversioner or reversioners, the estate became his or theirs, and it was an obvious extension of the doctrine to hold that inasmuch as he or they were in title to convey to a third party, it came to the same thing if the conveyance was made by the widow with his or their consent (80). ———Money business a losing concern—Duty to wind up—Mortgage for carrying it on—Validity.

A mortgage of her husband's estate by a Hindu widow was sought to be made binding upon the estate on the ground that a money business of the husband, which had been carried on by the widow, was in a critical state, and that the mortgage amount was borrowed to ward off total insolvency. The evidence was to the effect that at the husband's death the business was solvent on paper, but that there were bad debts the losses on which were never recovered, though the business struggled on for a good many years. The High Court, without laying down any general rule for such cases, was of opinion that the widow ought to have wound up the business at once, and that not having done so, she could not allege necessity to mortgage the inheritance in order to keep the money business going. On appeal their Lordships felt great difficulty, in deciding the question and observed that they would require to know much more about the nature of the business in question, and of the condition and fluctuations of the particular business before venturing to endorse the opinion of the High Court (201-2). Where one of the grounds on which the High Court held that a will set up was not genuine was that the witnesses to it were not such as they would have expected to find attesting the will, their Lordships observed that the family priest was an attesting witness to the will, and that such an attesting witness might well be supposed, by those at least who placed confidence in him, to be sufficient to save the will from the objection of being attested only by persons unconnected with the family, or too low to give support to such an instrument. ———Low position—Attestors being men of.

Where the will, the genuineness of which is in question, is not one which a Hindu gentleman situated as the testator was might not reasonably and naturally have made, and there is nothing in the case to suggest that the will had been forged or that the witnesses, who gave evidence as to the preparation, and as to the due execution of the will had committed perjury, the contention that the will should not be accepted as the genuine will of the testator because the witnesses to its execution were not of a superior position is not sound, and is contrary to law. Something more than mere suspicion is necessary in such a case to make convincing an argument based on the social position of the witnesses.

If the will had been executed at the home of the testator, it is possible that he might, by way of precaution, have obtained as witnesses to his will some neighbours of a superior class, but this will was executed at another place in the confusion which must have resulted from the outbreak of a severe epidemic of cholera, and the breaking up of the bathing fair by the Government's orders in consequence of the cholera. already bore the signature of the alleged testator, and that it was proved that the deceased had left blank papers, bearing his signature, and that the legatees under the will or their men were in possession of those papers. The Court below was also of opinion that the oral evidence was not satisfactory, none of the witnesses to the execution of the will being men of any status. Nothing was suggested, in the course of cross-examination, which was sufficient to discredit those witnesses, nor indeed were any questions put to them, which challenged the accuracy of the accounts they gave.

Their Lordships, who reversed the Court below, observed :—" It may be true that the witnesses to the will did not appear to be men of any status, the majority of them being cultivators, but their Lordships do not think that under the facts of this case, and having regard to the measure of suspicion hereinbefore indicated, there is sufficient ground for disbelieving their evidence as regards the execution of the will (702). Held, that the proposition that the will of a Hindu gentleman, attested by his own servants and dependants, must be held to be invalid, unless it was shown that the testator, at the time assigned for its execution, was placed in such circumstances that he could not secure the attendance of persons of a higher rank, was a proposition which verged two closely on the absurd to be seriously entertained (23-4).

There may be cases in which attestation by servants only is an important element to be taken into account in considering whether a will has been validly executed—cases, for example, in which there is reasonable ground for suspicion that the will is not the voluntary act of the testator, but has been procured by the undue influence of members of his household (24). If a party writes or prepares a will under which he takes a benefit, that is a circumstance that ought generally to excite the suspicion of the Court, and calls upon it to be vigilant and jealous in examining the evidence in support of the instrument, in favour of which it ought not to pronounce unless the suspicion is removed, and it is judicially satisfied that the paper propounded does express the true will of the deceased (158-9).

But there is no rule of law as to the particular kind or description of evidence by which the Court must be satisfied. The degree of suspicion excited and the weight of the burden imposed on the person taking the benefit must, however, depend largely on the nature and amount of the benefit taken by him and all the circumstances of the case (159). ———Children not born during lifetime of testator but living at time of distribution if take under.

The real doctrine of the court is that when children are mentioned in a will, that means prima facie, if no intervening interest be given, that which is considered to be the testator's meaning in the case of a gift to individuals, namely, those who may be living at the death of the testator. If the gift be not immediate, it may be that he intends to include all those children who may be living at the time of distribution; and the court judges of the intention in this respect from the whole scope of the will. The rule is not altered by the addition of words of futurity as if the gift be to children "born and to be born" or to children "begotten and to be begotten" (62).

The fact that the above rule of English law is a rule of convenience is some reason for applying it to Hindu wills, and an additional reason may be found in the well-known doctrine of Hindu law that a gift to an object not in existence is absolutely void (63). Semble, on the proper construction of the will, the bequest to the after-born nephews of the testator should be confined to nephews coming into existence between the date of the will and the testator's death (62).

If an English will expressed in similar terms were before an English court it would probably be held that the gift to after-born children was confined to children coming into existence between the date of the will and the testator's death. There is nothing in the circumstances in which this will was made, though the testator died the next day, to render that view improbable, for he expressly provides that if he recovers the will shall hold good unless altered. Will—Class—Gift to a.

———(See also HINDU LAW—GIFT—CLASS—GIFT TO A.)

———Gift over, on death of any of members, of his share to survivors—Accrued and original shares of deceased—English rule as to—Basis of—Inapplicability to Hindu wills.

It is undoubtedly a rule of English law that, when a fund is given to a class of persons, with direction that, on the death of any of them, their shares are to go over, the original shares only, and not the accruing shares, will go over. This rule was stated by Lord Hardwicke in Pain v. Benson, and has been followed, not always without expressions of reluctance, by a long series of decisions (60).

But an intention that the accruing shall go over with the original shares has been inferred where there is what has been called "an aggregate fund" which the testator desires to keep unsevered (when the gift has been to several with benefit of survivorship), when, in addition to the word "share," the word "interest" is used, or where the words are his "or her share or shares," so that the application of the doctrine to English wills has sometimes given rise to questions of some nicety. The rule, founded in a great measure on our peculiar doctrine, that the heir at-law is not to be disinherited but by express words or necessary implication, has no application to the wills of Hindus. It may be observed that such a course of devolution is the ordinary course for Hindu property as between brothers inheriting from brothers, and would present itself most readily to the mind of a Hindu testator; so that, even if the English rule should be applied anywhere beyond the domain of English law, it could hardly be applied to Hindu wills without defeating the intention (60-1). A Hindu by his will gave property to his three nephews. The will provided: "The said three nephews shall hold possession of the same in equal shares, and shall pay the Government revenue of the same into the Collectorate. They shall have no right to alienate the same by gift or sale; but they, their sons, grandsons, and other descendants in the male line, shall enjoy the same, and shall perform acts of piety as they respectively shall see fit for the spiritual welfare of our ancestors. If any of them die without leaving a male child (which God forbid), then his share shall devolve on the surviving nephews and their male descendants, and not on their other heirs."

The three nephews of the testator were living at his death; two of them died subsequently, one unmarried, the other leaving a widow but no issue. On a question arising whether upon the death of the brother dying secondly, his original share only, or the share also of his deceased brother which had accrued to him, went over to the last survivor of the nephews, held, that on the death of the first brother his share went to his two brothers, and that on the death of one of those, the share which he had at his death, made up of his original and his accrued share, went to the surviving brother (61).

Such a course of devolution is the ordinary course for Hindu property as between brothers inheriting from brothers, and would present itself most readily to the mind of a Hindu testator (61.)

Will—Codicil.

———Effect of—Alteration of will merely or new testamentary bequest—Codicil altering bequests in will by reference to will.

An Oudh taluqdar made a will in 1906, disposing of his whole estate in favour of his next heir, and inter alia bequeathed to his widow a monthly sum of Rs. 500 "from the estate." A fortnight before his death he executed a codicil, which was as follows :—"Will of 1906. In this 500 given to Rani. In place of this wants to give Rs. 1,000 per month. From this date to be given Rs. 1,000."

The codicil was inoperative to affect the talukdari property because it was not executed three months before the death of the testator as required by S. 13-A of the Oudh Estates Act of 1869. There was no such objection, however, to its affecting non-taluqdari property. It was contended that the codicil was intended to be a mere alteration of the will, not a new testamentary bequest, that its effect was, therefore, merely to read 500 plus 500 into the will instead of 500; that, upon a just construction of the will, the 500 was made a charge upon the taluqa and the taluqa alone; and that the codicil, not being dated more than three months prior to death, was powerless to further burden the taluqdari property and did not apply to the non-taluqdari property, Held, that the view put forward was much too a technical view of the codicil.

Their Lordships think that the words (used in the codicil) clearly mean that the testator provided his widow with 500 rupees more than she would get under the existing will, and that he did not signify the source from which that additional provision was to come. The reference to the will is not meant as the expression of a wish that the bequest in it should be textually altered so as to leave the altered figure to be governed grammatically by the words of the original context, but is merely historically mentioned to show what total provision he wished his widow to take. The result follows that the whole estate so far as burdenable is burdened with the provision then made (988.) In this 500 rupees given to Rani. In place of this wants to give Rs.1,000 per month. From this date to be given Rs, 1,000."

The Subordinate Judge held that the so-called codicil was not a document of a testamentary nature, relying upon the words :—"From this date" in the same.

Held, agreeing with the appeal Court, that the document was of a testamentary nature.

The words "From this date" are amply satisfied by construing them as a wish that the allowance should begin to run at once after death, and the idea that the talukdar was creating an annuity during his own lifetime by inter vivos conveyance is opposed to the whole circumstances surrounding the execution of the document (988). The will of a Hindu testator contained a clause for the cesser and determination of the life interest of the respondent in case he ceased to use as his residence the testator's Boitokanah house. The appellant was the person entitled to succeed as heir on such cesser and determination of the life interest of the respondent. He brought the suit out of which the appeal to the Privy Council arose to obtain possession of the property on the ground that the interest of the respondent ceased by reason of his non-fulfilment of the condition.

It appeared, however, that immediately after the death of the testator the appellant had instituted a suit disputing the title of the respondent and his right to possession, that, if the appellant had succeeded in his suit, he would have ejected the respondent from the house with the loss of any money he might have expended upon it, and with the liability to accouut for mesne profits, and that the respondent's failure to get possession of the house and to reside in it was due to the said litigation started by the appellant.

———Court's power of.

So soon as the construction is settled, the duty of the Court is to carry out the intentions of the testator as expressed in the will, and none other. The Court is in no case justified in adding to testamentary dispositions. If they transgress any legal restrictions, they must be disregarded. If they leave any eventuality unprovided for, the estate must in case that eventuality arises, be dealt with according to the law which provides for succession of property in the absence of testamentary directions applying thereto. But the Court never adds to a will anything which needs to be done by testamentary disposition. In all cases it must loyally carry out the will as properly construed, and this duty is universal, and is true alike of wills of every nationality and every religion or rank of life. ARCHER v. JEGON—RULE IN, AS TO GIFT AFTER PRIOR INTERESTS TO PERSONS "THEN" LIVING.

———Applicability—Benefit to subsequent beneficiaries through medium of trust—Effect.

By his will a testator devised to his wife during the term of her natural life the house called Capadia House, and he directed his executors during the lifetime of his wife to let another house of his called Rutton Villa, the rent of Rutton Villa being to count as part of the residuary income.

The clauses of the will material to the decision of the appeal were clauses 19, 20, 21 and 25.

"Clause 19. I further direct that after the decease of my said wife or in case she shall predecease me then forthwith after my death my executors shall stand seized and possessed of the Capadia House and the furniture therein and Rutton Villa and all my residuary property upon the several trusts in that behalf hereinafter declared, that is to say:—Cl. 20. My trustees shall stand seized of the Capadia House upon trust for my said son J for life and in the event of his death upon trust for his widow and issue in such shares and proportions as the said J may by his will direct, provided that it shall not be lawful for the said J to appoint more than one fourth part of the said premises to his widow and subject thereto and in default of any such appointment upon trust for the issue of the said J such issue to take per stirpes and not per capita and if more than one in the same class equally between them and in default of any such issue and subject to any appointment for his widow as aforesaid upon trust for his brother the said K if then living and failing him upon trust for the right heirs of me as if I had died possessed thereof intestate in equal shares and proportions but the issue of any heir shall take per stirpes and not per capita and if more than one in the same class equally between them and excluding from such heirs and such division the widowers of my said daughters and the widows of my said sons."

Clause 21 had similar limitations with regard to Rutton Villa, the two brothers being put in inverse order.

"Clause 25. My trustees shall divide the rest residue and remainder of my property equally between my said sons J & K but the property or the proceeds thereof shall be held by my executors for the benefit of the said J & K respectively upon the trusts which are hereinbefore declared of and concerning Capadia House and Rutton Villa respectively as fully and effectually as if the share of the said residue given to my son J were part and parcel of Capadia House and the share of the said residue given to my son K were part and parcel of Rutton Villa."

J died without leaving widow or issue; but the widow of the testator was living. K, claiming that he had fulfilled the condition imposed in clause 20, inasmuch as at the date of his brother he was "then living," instituted a suit to have the construction of the will determined.

Held that, on the true construction of the material clauses of the will, upon the death of J, Capadia House vested absolutely in K subject to the life interest of the testator's widow (264).

The case fell within the rule (in Archer v. Jegon) "that when there is a gift after prior interests to persons then living, the word "then" refers most naturally to the last antecedent. The fact that the gift to the wife of the house for her life was direct, while the subsequent limitations were to trustees for the benefit of the subsequent beneficiaries, far from taking the dispositions of this will out of the rule, rather tended in the contrary direction (261 3.) The terms of the will of a Hindu lady, so far as material, were as follows:—Under the will of my husband I am the sole owner in possession (malik-o-qabiz) of his entire estate and possess all proprietary powers. I bequeath the entire estate of my husband to Fateh Chand....subject to the following conditions:—(1) So long as I live, I shall continue to be the owner in possession of the entire estate, the subject of the will, and possess all the powers, such as making sales, mortgages, gifts, etc. (2) After my death the said person (the legatee) shall become owner in possession of the entire estate of my husband and he, too, shall possess all powers of alienation like myself....(4) I have bequeathed Mauza Khudda, with all the property, to Mussumat G. After my death she shall be the owner in possession of the entire property in Mauza Khudda aforesaid."

Held that, on the true construction of the will, the entire estate granted in the first place to Fateh Chand was subject to an exeception in regard to Mauza Khudda which Mussumat G took absolutely under the will.

This is not a repugnancy in the proper sense of the term, and taking the clauses of the will together, it simply means that Fateh Chand takes the entire estate with the exception of this village, while it, in proper conveyancing terms, is disposed of in favour of Mussumat G (186). The will of a Khoja resident of Bombay started by a direction that the trustees were to set apart Rs. 3,000, and pay the income to his eldest son, A, for life, with a provision against his disposing of it, the sum so set apart to fall into residue at A's death. The will then ran as follows:—

I direct my said trustees of the survivor or survivors of them to set apart a sum of Rs. 80,000 and the house No. 83 situate at Dhoorga Moholla, and I declare that my said trustees or the survivor or survivors of them shall invest the said sum of Rs. 80,000 in such manner as they, she or he may think proper, and shall out of the net income or produce thereof give to my daughter-in-law R, the wife of A, every month a sum of rupees not exceeding Rs. 200 for the maintenance and household expenses of herself, her husband, the said A, and of their children present and future, if and so long as my said son A should live with the said R my daughter-in-law and her children and if the said A live separate from his wife the said R and family, then I direct my said trustees or the survivor or survivors of them to pay Rs. 150 a month to my said daughter-in-law R for the purposes aforesaid and the sum of Rs. 50 to the said A, and my said trustees or the survivor or survivors of them shall invest the surplus of such produce or income in such manner as they shall think proper, such surplus to be spent on the marriage of the children of my said son A by the said R....I declare that after my said son A, his wife and children have removed from my house they shall be allowed to reside in the said house No. 83, and I direct that on the youngest son of my said son A, by the said R or any other lawful wife attaining the age of twenty-one years, my said trustees or the survivor or survivors of them shall convey to them jointly the said house No. 83 and shall divide amongst them equally the said sum Rs. 80,000 and the accumulations thereof if any for their sole and absolute use and benefit free from all control, power and authority of my said trustees or any of them or of their father the said A.

Later on in the will there was a bequest of Rs. 10 a month to each of the two daughters of A, to commence upon their marriage and to last during their lives free of the control of their husbands.

In a suit by the two daughters of A, the question arose whether or not they were sharers in the capital sum of Rs. 80,000 and the house No. 83.

Held, agreeing with the Court of Appeal, that the plaintiffs were entitled to the benefit of the directions contained in the will regarding the house No. 83, and the sum of Rs. 80,000 and the accumulations thereof, and that the word "them" in the clause of conveyance referred to A, his wife R and their children.

The language of the clause about control does not operate to destroy the plain language of the clause of conveyance.

If the control clause had ever come into operation it would probably have been right to read it as meaning that the beneficiaries other than A should be free from his con-

ENGLISH RULES.

———Applicability of.

It is no new doctrine that rules established in English Courts for construing English documents are not as such applicable to transactions between natives of this country (India). Rules of construction are rules designed to assist in ascertaining intention, and the applicability of many such rules depends upon the habits of thought and modes of expression prevalent amongst those to whose language they are applied. English rules of construction have grown up side by side with a very special law of property and a very artificial system of conveyancing, and the success of those rules in giving effect to the real intention of those whose language they are used to interpret, depends not more upon their original fitness for that purpose than upon the fact that English documents of a formal kind are ordinarily framed with a knowledge of the very rules of construction which are afterwards applied to them. It is a very serious thing to use such rules in interpreting the instruments of Hindus, who view most transactions from a different point, think differently, and speak differently, from Englishmen, and who have never heard of the rules in question (64-5)—and who have never heard of the rules in question (64-5)—Per Wilson, J in 12 C. 663 approved. In other cases the rules are the expression of such tendencies in the Court as the desire to avoid an intestacy or the presumption in favour of the immediate vesting of an estate. Such rules are purely an English pooduct based on English necessities and English habits of thought and there would

INTENTION OF TESTATOR.

———Ascertainment of—Data for—Words of will—Surrounding circumstances.

There is no difference between the English and the Hindu laws as to the materials from which the intention of the testator is to be collected. Primarily the words of the will are to be considered. They convey the expression of the testator's wishes; but the meaning to be attached to them may be affected by surrounding circumstances, and where this is the case those circumstances no doubt must be regarded. Amongst the circumstances thus to be regarded, is the law of the country under which the will is made and its dispositions are to be carried out. If that law has attached to particular words a particular meaning, or to a particular disposition a particular effect, it must be assumed that the testator, in the dispositions which he has made, had regard to that meaning or to that effect, unless the language of the will or the surrounding circumstances displace that assumption (550 1). In all cases the primary duty of a Court is to ascertain from the language of the testator what were his intentions, i e., to construe the will. It is true that in so doing they are entitled and bound to bear in mind other matters than merely the words used. They must consider the surrounding circumstances, the position of the testator, his family relationships, the probability that he would use words in a particular sense, and many other things which are often summed up in the somewhat picturesque figure. "The Court is entitled to put itself into the testator's armchair." Among such surrounding circumstances which the Court is bound to consider none would be more important than race and religious opinions, and the Court is bound to regard as presumably (and in many cases certainly) present to the mind of the testator influences and aims arising therefrom. But all this is solely as an aid to arriving at a right construction of the will, and to ascertain the meaning of its language when used by that particular testator in that document. INTENTION OF TESTATOR—(Contd.)

The first duty of the Court expounding a will is to ascertain what is the meaning of the words used by the testator. That which he has written is to be construed by every part being taken into consideration according to its grammatical construction and the ordinary acceptation of the words used, with the assistance of such parol evidence of the surrounding circumstances as is admissible, to place the Court in the position of the testator (228-9). ———Ascertainment of—Mode true of.

The true mode of construing a will is to consider it as expressing in all its parts, whether consistent with law or not, the intention of the testator, and to determine upon a reading of the whole will, whether, assuming the limitations therein mentioned to take effect, an interest claimed under it was intended under the circumstances, to be conferred (79). That native testators should be ignorant of the legal phrases proper to express their intentions, or of the legal steps necessary to carry them into effect, is one of the most important of the "surrounding circumstances" which the Court must bear in mind, and it is justified in refusing to allow defects in expression in these matters to prevent the carrying out of the testator's true intentions. But those intentions must be ascertained by the proper construction of the words he uses, and once ascertained they must not be departed from. Where, by acting on one interpretation of the words used by a testator we are driven to the conclusion that the person using them is acting capriciously, without any intelligible motive, contrary to the ordinary mode in which men in general act in similar cases, then, if the language admits of two constructions, we may reasonably and properly adopt that which avoids these anomalies, even though the construction adopted is not the most obvious or the most grammatically accurate. ———Ambiguous language—Reasonable and probable intention on part of testator—Construction bespeaking—Court's duty to adopt—Extrinsic evidence of intention—Admissibility of.

Where the question was whether the expression "Maharani Sahiba" was used in the will of an Oudh talukdar as a collective term comprehending both his widows, or whether it applied to his senior widow alone, held that the case was not one in which it would be proper to admit extrinsic evidence of the testator's intention (147).

It is rather a case in which the difficulty created by the particular expression ought to be solved by adopting the construction which bespeaks a reasonable and probable intention and rejecting that which would indicate an intention unreasonable, capricious, and inconsistent with the testator's views, as evidenced by his conduct and by the dispositions of his will which are not open to controversy. The rule is laid down by Lord, Cranworth thus: "When, by acting on one interpretation of the words used, we are driven to the conclusion that the person using them is acting capriciously, without any intelligible motive, contrary to the ordinary mode in which men in general act in similar cases, then, if the language admits of two constructions, we may reasonably and properly adopt that which avoids these anomalies, even though the construction adopted is not the most grammatically accurate (144). To construe one will by reference to expression of more or less doubtful import to be found in other wills is for the most part an unprofitable exercise. Happily that method of interpretation has gone out of fashion in this country (England). To extend it to India would hardly be desirable. To search and sift the heaps of cases on wills which number our English law reports, in order to understand and interpret wills of people speaking a different tongue, trained in different habits of thought and brought up under different conditions of life, seems almost absurd. In the Subordinate Courts of India such a practice. if permitted, would encourage litigation and lead to idle and endless arguments. (Lord Macnaghten.) NORENDRA NATH SIRCAR v. KAMALABASINI DASI. Amongst the circumstances thus to be regarded, is the law of the country under which the will is made and its dispositions are to be carried out. If that law has attached to particular words a particular meaning, or to a particular disposition a particular effect, it must be assumed that the testator, in the dispositions which he has made, had regard to that meaning or to that effect, unless the language of the will or the surrounding circumstances displace that assumption (550-1). It is my wish to make a temple at Ombica ; should I die before the completion of this, you will make the temple and consecrate it, from the residue of my estate which remains under your charge.

Held that, on the right construction of the will, the testator did not intend that a temple should be built and consecrated at Brindabun (249).

When the deceased intended that a temple should be built, he has said so in express words ; but he has not directed that a temple was to be built at Brindabun, and there is no evidence from which that could be ascertained to have been his intention. It must therefore be assumed that the testator meant some other building to be erected at Brindabun (249-30).

Having no son, he, by the 9th clause of his will, made the following provision in regard to his general estate :—"Should my executor, S, my younger brother, have more than two sons within eight years from this date, in that case such son shall be made my adopted son. Should such adopted son die within the said appointed period of eight years, in that case should there be other sons of my brother within the specified time of eight years power is reserved for adopting up to the extent of a third time. Should brother have no more than two sons, or the adopted sons shall die one after the other, in that case the share belonging to me of company's papers and lands and houses and gardens and so-forth, the whole real and personal estate will be received by my younger brother S." That which was the only clause in the will regulating the disposal of the general estate of the testator, made no special provision in regard to the income of the estate during the eight years in the course of which the testator's brother might have a son who could be validly adopted as the testator's heir,

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

S had one son only, and consequently the power of adoption conferred by the testator on his widow could not be exercised. During the eight years which elapsed after the testator's death, S himself administered the estate, and received the income and retained it.

The widow claimed the eight years' income which had not been specially disposed of by the will, on the ground that it was intestate succession falling to her as her husband's widow and heiress. S maintained, on the other hand, that the income of those years became his property under the general destination to him of the real and personal estate of the testator.

Their Lordships observed that it would be difficult to suggest a reason for holding that the eight years' income was not covered and conveyed by the general destination to S of the testator's whole real and personal estate (22). Will—Daughters.

———Bequest to—Estate conveyed under—Absolute estatte —Life estate.

The will of a Hindu, after directing the formation of a fund for the payment of a monthly sum to his widow for life, directed that the trustees were "to apportion the residuary trust funds into as many equal parts or shares as there may be daughters of mine living at the time of my decease or who having predeceased me shall have left issue her or them or me surviving." The trustees were then to "pay the income of each of such equal parts or shares to my said daughters respectively during their respective lives. And from and after the decease of each of my said daughters to stand possessed of the share of the residuary trust funds so appropriated as aforesaid to such daughter upon trust for the children of such daughter who shall attain the age of 21 years." The testator then directed that in the event of any of the daughters dying without leaving lawful issue the trustees were to "stand possessed of the share or shares so appropriated to her or them as aforesaid" on trust for her children who should attain 21. He went on to introduce a proviso under which, if a daughter died in his lifetime leaving lawful issue, such issue as should attain 21 years were to take the share " which would have been so appropriated as aforesaid to such daughter of mine and her issue if she had survived me."

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Will—Daughters—(Contd.)

The appellate Court held that, upon the true construction of the will, the intention of the testator was, in the first instance, to make an absolute gift in favour of each of his daughters, the provisions which followed being a mere settlement of the gift thus absolutely made, and that consequently, under S. 126 of the Succession Act, the daughters of the testator took absolutely when those provisions failed of effect.

Held, reversing the appellate Court, that there were not to be found in the will the absolute bequests required by S. 126, and that the daughters took only for life.

The first trust for appointment directed merely division of the fund into as many equal parts or shares as there were daughters living at the testator's death or sets of issue then living of daughters then dead. The words of apportionment are introduced for merely arithmetical purposes and so far do not dispose of property. In order to find the interest given under the will it is necessary to proceed to the further words, and these, in the case of a daughter, confine her interest to a right to income for life. They are followed by words of disposition in favour of the children and issue. This view of what may be called the apportionment clause is even more apparent as ragards the suggested gift to issue of a deceased daughter. There is no unqualified gift to them by the apportionment clause. The effective gift, in the later words of the will is to such of a deceased daughter's children as attain 21. And if of this will it could be said that the testator had used the words "issue" and "children" interchangeably then the limitation to such children only as attained 21 could, if there were a prior gift to them without that qualification, be merely otiose. If so much cannot be said, then there is no room for the operation of the rule. (Viscount Haldane.) SOUNDAR RAJAN v. NATARAJAN.

———Bequest to—Estate conveyed under—Absolute estate—Life estate in equal shares with benefit of survivorship.

The clause of the will of a Hindu relating to his daughters was as follows :—

"But in case none of such adopted sons servive my said wife, or in case of either surviving my said wife and dying under the said age without leaving a son or sons, I desire and direct my executors, after the death of my said wife, or the death of such sons after her, but under the age of 18 years without leaving a son or sons, to make over and divide the whole of my estate, both real and personal, into and between my daughters in equal shares, to whom and their respective sons I give, devise and bequeath the same, but should either of my said daughters die without leaving any male issue surviving, but leaving my other daughter her surviving, then in such case the surviving daughter and her sons shall be entitled to the share of the deceased daughter, or in the case of the death of either daughter leaving sons, the share of such daughter is to be paid to such her son or sons share and share alike."

Held, reversing the judgments below, that, according to the true construction of the will, the intention of the testator was to create in favour of his daughters an estate for life with a remainder over to their sons, and, in the events that had happened, the daughters of the testator were entitled to the testator's estate in equal shares for life and with benefit of survivorship between themselves.

The testator has clearly succeeded in shewing that his daughters, whom be incontestably intended to benefit, were not to have more than what is generally known to be a woman's estate in his property. This is established by the gift to them " and their respective sons", and by the proviso that in the event of one of the daughters dying " without leaving any male issue surviving," then the share of the deceased daughter is to go to the surviving daughter and her sons, to the exclusion in both cases of female issue. Moreover, "in the case of the death of either daughter leaving sons, the share of such daughter is to be paid to such her son or sons share and share alike." No language could more clearly show that the intention of the testator was to exclude his daughter's daughters from the succession, to which they would have been entitled under the ordinary Hindu law, if their mother's estate had been absolute. ——— Bequest to—Estate conveyed under—Absolute estate—Life estate with right of survivorship as regards pre-deceased daughter's share—Test.

The will of a Hindu provided, by Clause 2 : " After my death my said two daughters shall be my lawful heirs, and they alone shall in equal shares become owners of all my properties subject to the provisions of this will ; the (said) two daughters shall acquire all manner of rights consistent with Hindu Law, in the properties that shall be left by me. God forbid, if my death takes place after the marriage of another, then the unmarried daughter shall not be entitled to claim the entire property by virtue of her not being given in marriage, nor shall she get the same ; even if such a circumstance should happen, both the daughters shall inherit in equal shares. The daughters and their sons, that is to say, my heirs, shall enjoy the properties, etc., so long as they shall live in this house at Boalmari. Nobody shall ever by fixing the abode at any other place than this be entitled to own or enjoy the property. None shall be competent to succeed to property who may go to live elsewhere. Nobody shall at any time be competent to remove the Sadar Cutchery at Balidanga to any other place, the Sadar Cutchery shall always remain there. Such is the injunction also from my ancestors."

In other clauses of the will, notably in clauses 3, 5 and 6 the word " heirs " was used to denote not the daughters only, but those daughters and their sons.

Again, when referring in terms only to the testator's daughters, the will fettered their power over the property. Clause 7 provided that if either of the daughters, elder or younger, desired to have a partition of the property effected, she should not be competent to do so. Clause 8 was as follows : " When the daughters shall attain majority, the executors shall make over to their satisfaction the properties, etc, and everything, if they decline to accept the properties, etc. into their own hands as being incapable, the executors shall, when the daughter's sons attain majority, retire after making over everything to them to their satisfaction."

Held that, on the true construction of the will, the only interest thereby given to the testator's daughters respectively in his property was the interest of a daughter as recognised by the Hindu Law, and not an absolute interest.

A power to alienate is an essential incident of an absolute interest in property. Not only is no such power in terms conferred upon the daughters, but the prohibition against partition by them and the provision of clause 8 for the benefit of their sons indicate clearly that the whole scheme of the will is that the property shall remain intact after the death of both daughters for the benefit of their sons as the heirs of the testator.

By his will a Hindu directed his executors as follows: "to make over and divide the whole of my estate between my daughters in equal shares, to whom and their respective sons I give, devise, and bequeath the same, but should either of my said daughters die without leaving any male issue surviving but leaving my other daughter her surviving, then the surviving daughter and her sons shall be entitled to the share of the deceased daughter, or, in case of the death of either daughter leaving sons, the share of such daughter is to be paid to such her son or sons' share and share alike." The testator died leaving two daughters, one of whom alone had sons at the time. The latter died sometime after the death of the testator leaving behind her, her sister, her sons born during the testator's lifetime, and other sons born subsequently. On a question arising as to whether in the events that happened the share of the deceased daughter passed over for life to the surviving sister or to her sons born during the testator's lifetime, held that it passed to the latter and not to the former.

The question whether sons of the deceased daughter born after the death of the testator were or were not entitled to take under the will was left open by their Lordships. Will—Daughter's children.

———Bequest to—Joint tenants—Tenants in common—Bequest to them as.

G, a deceased Hindu, had no male issue, but had two daughters, P aged seven years, and S aged three, born of his fourth wife Sivagangai. By his will, dated 19—10—1864, he gave away his estate, which he described, to his said two daughters. Then occurred the following sentences in the said will :—

" The aforesaid two daughters after their marriage shall with their husbands remain is this family and enjoy as one family the income of the aforesaid properties without division and without alienating by sale, etc."

" If in so doing there should be disagreement between them, the income thereof minus the just expenses, shall be enjoyed by them both in equal shares. If both the said daughters have issue, they shall divide the said properties equally. Those who have no issue shall as aforesaid enjoy the income for their lives and those who have issue shall enjoy the whole property. Till then the miras shall continue in my name. In case your mother and you disagree and live separately you shall pay 21 kalams of paddy and 7 Rupees a year for her maintenance "

G, further provided that if he should recover and get a male child, the entire property should go to that child He died, however, a few days afterwards, and there was no male child born. P, married and had issue, the appellants, and S, also married, and died subsequently. Whether or no she had a child was matter of dispute. She had none living at the time of her death.

The Courts below held, on the construction of the will, that on the birth of children to both the daughters, they took absolute interests in severalty. On appeal to their Lordships it was contended that the testator's intention was to let the estate devolve as joint family property.

Held, overruling the contention, that it was manifestly inconsistent with the position assigned to the testator's widow, and with the gift first of the income and afterwards of the property to his daughters in moieties (127). (Lord Hobhouse.) GURUSAMI PILLAI v. SIVAKAMI AMMAL.

Will—Daughter's daughter.

———Bequest to—Estate conveyed—Absolute estate—Words—"Poutradikrame"—Effect.

After providing for a widow's estate for his wife, a Hindu by his will directed as follows:—

"If no daughter or daughter's son of mine should be living at the time of the death of my wife, then my grand daughter (daughter's daughter) shall become the proprietress of my property, and shall remain in undisputed possession thereof from generation to generation."

Held, that that provision, if it stood alone, would confer an absolute estate on the grand-daughter upon the death of the widow (62).

The next clause in the will was as follows:—"If the death of my wife should take place before my grand-daughter (daughter's daughter) arrives at majority and bears a son, then the whole of the estate shall remain in charge of the Court of Wards until she arrives at majority and bears a son." Reliance was placed on this clause for enforcing the argument that the testator's object was to benefit the sons of his grand-daughter.

Held, that that object the testator might reasonably suppose best effectuated by giving complete power over the ———Bequest to—Estate conveyed—Absolute estate—Life estate—Words "Heir and malik"—Effect.

Will—Daughter-in-law.

At the time when the testator executed the will, the construction of which was in question in the appeal, the state of his family was as follows:—There were living only D, the widow of his pre-deceased son, and her two daughters by that son, who at that time were unmarried.

The testator recited that the property of which he was about to dispose by the will was ancestral property. He recited the death of his son. D's husband, and the death of his own wife, and he recited that D, the widow of his son, was alive, that she had no heirs except her two daughters, who would be her heir. And he continued: "And my wife too died before, only D, widow of K, my deceased son above mentioned, who too, excepting her two daughters born of her womb, has no other heirs, is my heir." And then he further went on to say, "excepting D, aforesaid, none other is nor shall be my heir and malik." He proceeded, however, to again refer to the daughters of D, and went on to say, "Furthermore, to the said D, too, these very two daughters named above, together with their children, who after their marriage may be given in blessing to them by God Almighty, are and shall be heir and malik."

Held, affirming the Courts below, that, on the right construction of the will, the intention of the testator was that D, the widow of his son, should not take an absolute estate which she should have power to dispose of absolutely, but that she took an estate subject to her daughters succeeding her in that estate (15).

It would appear that that the testator uses the word " heir " as signifying the person who is to take immediately in succession to another ; that he applies it to D, as the person who is to take in immediate succession to him, and to the two daughters as the persons who are immediately to succeed to D ; and their Lordships think that, viewing the will as a whole, when he uses the expression " except D, aforesaid, none other is nor shall be my heir and malik," it may be fairly construed as meaning that she shall take a life interest immediately succeeding him, without that interest being shared by her daughters or by any other person. On the whole, therefore, the courts below were right in construing the will as not giving an estate of inheritance to D, which she was able absolutely to alienate (15). (*Sir Robert P. By his will an Oudh talookdar declared his wife "representative. and proprietor, of my estate, and property, moveable and immoveable," and provided that "until she make some one representative, let her remain representative, like myself, without power to aliene."

In August, 1872, the widow of the talookdar, who had died before, executed a document which, after reciting that she should make a will regarding the appointment of an heir and representative, after herself, in place of her husband, provided as follows:—

"I have appointed the youth Triloki Nath, nephew of my husband, heir and representative in place of my husband, of all the rights and dignities conferred on my husband by the British Government, and of the entire estate, and all property, moveable and immoveable. The said youth shall, after my death, remain, from generation to generation, in the enjoyment of all the rights and dignities, in place of my husband; and the said youth will also own, and enjoy the property belonging to me, moveable and immoveable. I will fix such maintenance as I may think fit for P, and for D. These allowances shall continue to be paid by the said youth, and by his successors, for ever, after my death; and the said youth, and his successors, shall also discharge any money debts, or verbal contracts, binding on me, or on the estate. I have, therefore, written these few words of the nature of a will, that after my death they may be of use when required."

Held, on a construction of the deed of 1872, that it was not a present irrevocable appointment, but that it was a will taking effect only on the death of the Maharanee (the executant), and ambulatory and revocable in her lifetime (207-8).

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Will—Deed amounting to a—(Contd.)

APPOINTMENT OF HEIR PRESENT AND IRREVOCABLE OR—(Contd.)

The document commences with a recital of the will of the Maharaja (the husband) styling it "a will." The Maharanee then says that life is uncertain, and that after her death disputes might arise as to the succession to the raj, and proceeds, "It is therefore right that I should make a will regarding the appointment of an heir and representative, after myself, in the place of the Maharaja; I therefore, being of good health and sound mind, have appointed the youth, Triloki Nath, nephew of my husband, heir and representative." She proceeds to say that the youth will enjoy the property after her death. She also bequeaths to him her own property. She says she will fix allowances for maintenance to relatives, which are to be paid after her death by Triloki Nath, who is also to pay her debts. She concludes by saying she has written these few words "in the nature of a will," "that after her death they may be of use" (208).

The document, both in its beginning and its end is expressly styled a will. In the beginning, it is so styed after reference to the Maharajah's "will," and an instrument of the same nature as his was evidently contemplated. It is also plainly declared by the Maharanee that Triloki Nath was to become representative only after her death, and there is no indication whatever that she intended to divest herself of her husband's property during her lifetime, any more than of her own, which she also bequeaths (208).

Further when the Maharanee sent a copy of the document to the Superintendent of the Court of Wards to inform him that she proposed Triloki Nath, to be successor of the Maharajah after her death, she calls it "a will" (208).

It was argued that the document was evidence that she had made an immediate appointment, because the words "I have appointed" are used. There is no pretence for saying that she had appointed Triloki Nath otherwise than by the instrument itself. These words therefore can only have operation according to the nature of the instrument. They are not in themselves inconsistent with a disposition by will and are altogether insufficient to countervail the express description of the document as a will, and its general tenor (208-9). Their Lordships rejected the contention that there was really no bequest in favour of the nephews, and that so far as they were concerned the will only declared a right of inheritance.

It is not very easy to determine the proper meaning of the expression translated by the words "by right of inheritance". Whatever the exact meaning of this doubtful expression may

A Hindu made a will, which contained an appointment of his wife and his daughter to be executrixes, and consisted of two parts, namely, (1) a disposal of the property in a certain way, and (2) an authority to his widow in a certain event to take a son by adoption. He had nominated as his son, V, a son of his daughter, but he had not completed the adoption. By his will he directed that, if he should die before completing the adoption, his wife should, after his death, complete the necessary ceremonies and take the said grandson in adoption, and his will contained the following clause: "In case any danger may happen to my grandson V, during the lifetime of my wife who is one of my executrixes my wife may according to her wishes take in adoption one of my said daughter's sons, and give my properties to that son."

Held, that the document was a will (23).

Sir Man Singh was one of the great landholders of Oudh, whose status and rights were the subject of Act I of 1869. He died on 11—10—1870. Some years before the passing of Act I of 1869, viz., on 22—4—1864, he executed a will, which was in the following terms:—

"Whereas my intention as regards making any boy representative has not yet become fixed, I therefore, for the present, declare my aforesaid Maharani" (his wife) "representative and proprietor, of my estate, and property, moveable and immoveable; until she make some one representative, let her remain representative, like myself, without power to aliene; and as regards my property, moveable and immoveable, no sharer or partner has any claim. Held, that the will was a testamentary instrument. The Maharajah states, as a reason for making it, that his intention as regards making any boy representative had not become fixed. ———Devolution of property as per—Declaration of—Deed amounting to, or to a new will—Test.

N was the last male holder of an Oudh talooka. After his death without issue a summary settlement of the taluka was made with one of his widows, R, on 2—12—1858, and on the 15th of March, 1861, a sunnud was granted to her conferring on her an estate of inheritance according to the law of primogeniture, together with full power of alienation. It appeared that in January, 1861, a letter, probably a circular letter was sent to her, and that on the 6th January 1861, she sent a reply thereto which was as follows:—

"Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your parwana (letter), dated the 7th of December, 1860, inquiring as to whom I wish to bequeath my estate after my death, and what relationship he bears to me.

"Sir, so long as I live I shall continue to be the proprietor and mistress of my estate. After my death my rival widows, S and K, shall succeed to my heritage and the estate. But I must note that none of my two rival widows shall have power to alienate the estate by gift, transfer, or grant to any of their relatives, or to any stranger after my death, except Ram Sarup and Balbhadar, talookdars of Khapradih. After my death, and after the death of the two rival widows, Ram Sarup and Balbhadar shall inherit the estate and all our legacy."

That letter of the 6th of January was treated by the appellate Courts as simply a will, revocable by the testatrix.

Held, differing from the Courts below, that it was rather a declaration that, on her death, the estate would devolve according to the directions of her husband's will (50).

If the letter had stood alone it might have been treated as simply a will. But, looking at the document in connection with the will of N, the other documents, and the conduct of R, their Lordships regard it rather as a declaration that, on her death, the estate would devolve according to the directions of the will (50). WAJIB-UL-ARZ—ENTRY IN.

———Will or a mere expression of opinion as to devolution of property.

The material portion of the Wajib-ul-arz of a village was in the following terms:—

If a shareholder has no male issue his property after his death devolves upon his widow, provided the property is partitioned. The widow has the power to make transfer by sale, mortgage, or gift. If the property be undivided, the widow shall remain the proprietress during her lifetime, but shall have no authority to transfer the property.

The Wajib-ul-arz was duly verified by F, the last male owner of an 8 annas share in the said village, and by his cosharer.

Held, that the entry in the Wajib-ul-arz could not be held to be a will, or a document of a testamentary character, by F.

It may have been an expression of F's own opinion; clearly it cannot be treated as sufficient evidence of a devise to the widow of an absolute estate. (Lord Macnaghten.) SAHODRA v. GANESH PARSHAD. (1905) 10 C. W. N. 249 = 1 M. L. T. 64.

———Will in favour of adopted son if a.

It would be incorrect to lay down, as a general proposition, that a recital in a wajib-ul-arz cannot operate as a will in the case of a Hindu. The weight to be given to such statements must depend, in each case, on the circumstances in which the entries were originally made, and the corroboration they receive from extrinsic evidence.

A wajib-ul-arz, recorded under Act XIX of 1873 and relating to a village called D, contained, under the head of "Inheritance, second marriage, and adoption," the following statement:—

"I am the only zemindar in this village. I am a Marwari Brahmin. Seven years ago I adopted my sister's son, M. He is my heir and will be the owner. If, after this agreement, a son is born to me, half the property will be received by him and half by the adopted son. If more than one son are born to me, the property will be equally divided among them, including the adopted son as brothers. I have two wives now. They will receive their maintenance from him (M) during their lifetime."

———Immovable property if included.

No doubt the word "effects," like many other words of general and indefinite meaning, may be sufficient in a certain context to pass immovable as well as movable property. Further, if this would be so in Great Britain, it would be so a fortiori in India, where there is little distinction between movable and immovable property when matters of succession have to be considered. Primarily, no doubt, the word refers to personal estate or movables.

The material part of the will of an Armenian Christian resident in Rangoon, by which he appointed his wife executrix, was as follows: "I give and devise and bequeath my three houses numbered respectively....in Halpin Road, in the said town of Rangoon, together with land thereto belonging and all the out-offices and buildings standing thereon, and all my household furnitures, carriages, horses, chattels and effects, and all moneys and debts due and owing to me which I shall be possessed of at the time of my death unto my said executrix absolutely."

At the time of his death, the testator was possessed of other immovable property besides that mentioned in his will—namely, certain land at Kokine in a subarb of Rangoon.

Held that, on the true construction of the will, the word "effects" did not include immovable property, and that there was, therefore, an intestacy as to the land at Kokine (286).

After the specific devise of the three houses in Halpin Road, the will proceeds, "and all my household furnitures, carriages, horses, chattels and effects..which I shall be possessed of at the time of my death." It does not say "all other." The words "which I shall be possessed of at the time of my death" refer solely to "the household furnitures, carriages, horses, chattels and effects." And after the specific reference to the Halpin Road property, it is not lightly to be inferred that the testator intended that his other lands, whether then owned by him or to be acquired thereafter, should pass by general words, as such general words. There is no indication of the testator's intention to devise any land which he had or might thereafter have beside the Halpin Road property. Will—Estate conveyed under—(Contd.)

A talukdar, whose name was entered in Lists 1 & 2 prepared under S. 8 of the Oudh Estates Act of 1869, executed a will bequeathing the whole of his property to his widow for her life, and subject thereto to his daughter-in-law for her life, subject in both cases alike to the condition that neither should have power "under any circumstances by sale, alienation, mortgage or otherwise, to dispose of or incumber the whole or any part of my movable or immovable property for any period extending beyond the term of her natural life." There was a clause providing for a gift over which ran as follows:—"And upon her" (daughter-in-law's) "death in default of an adopted son if authorised by her husband to adopt a son I direct that my said property and estate shall descend to the person or persons then living who under the provisions of the said" (Oudh Estate) "Act I of 1869 would be entitled to succeed thereto on the failure or determination of the limitations hereinbefore contained."

Held that, on the true construction of the will, the interest taken by the daughter-in law was, in the strictest sense, an interest for her life only; that under the gift neither the widow nor the daughter-in-law became a fresh stock of descent of any of the property bequeathed; and that the destination under the gift over, on the death of the daughter-in-law, was not, putting it broadly, to the heir-at-law of the testator at his own death; that, in other words, the only other testamentary gift, in the events which had happened, was in favour of persons unascertainable up to the moment of the daughter-in-law's death (163).

There can under the will be no vested interest in remainder or otherwise so long as the daughter in-law lives (163). An Oudh talookdar left a will by which he provided for successive life estates to his widows, and, after the death of all of them, for one S succeeding to, and becoming proprietor of, his estate. On the death af the talookdar, a summary settlement of his estate was made with R, one of his widows, and a sunnud was granted to her. By her conduct R constituted herself a trustee of the estate for the purposes of carrying into effect the provisions of her husband's will. She, however, purported to make a gift of the estate to B. Another widow of the deceased talookdar was alive.

In a suit brought by the son of S, who had died in the interval, for a declaration that the deed of gift in favour of B was invalid against the plaintiff, who was a reversioner, because the donor (R) held only a life interest, and was a trustee, anything contained in Act I of 1869 notwithstanding, held that the plaintiff having, in terms of the English law, a vested remainder immediately after the life estates, was entitled, under the Specific Relief Act, to maintain the suit (53). ———Creation of, through medium of trust—Validity.

It was contended that the first life interest given to J by the will in question was void because of the contingency and uncertainty of the period at which it was to commence, because of the preference given to the legacies and annuities, and to their being payable first out of the interest of the personalty, and then out of the rents of the realty, except the allowance of Rs. 2,500 per month, so that it was said that life estate might never come into existence, because the legacies and annuities, and interest on arrears, might never be completely satisfied (74).

That objection exhausts itself upon the enjoyment of the usufruct more or less. The life interest was to begin at once. It was subject to the devise to trustees who were to receive the rents, allow the life-holder Rs 2,500 per month out of the net proceeds, apply the remainder in aid of the interest of the personalty, to pay off the legacies and annuities, and, when they were discharged, to allow the life holder, if he survived so long, or, if not, the succeeding donees in succession to enjoy the whole. If the trust is not to be read to make estates valid which otherwise would be void, so neither is it to be read to defeat interests which without the trust would be valid. Their Lordships read this will alike according to its words and substance, as giving a life interest, subject to a charge for payment of legacies and annuities, whereby the rents over and above Rs 2,500 per month, and the expense of maintenance, are to be applied in aid of another fund until the legacies and annuities are paid. The law of perpetuity has no application to such a state of things. There is not a single estate or interest in question which would not be valid within the English law of perpetuity (75-6). HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Will—Estate for life—(Contd.)

"After my death, Rani Rukman Kuwar having held and possessed all my property, her descendants shall, generation after generation, carry out the provisions of this will, and after paying up the expenses mentioned herein, apply the remainder of the profits to their own use. And Rajah Gajadhar Baksh, son of Rani Rukman Kuwar, being of under age, shall, when he attains the age of majority, carry on the work of management, with the advice of the aforesaid Rani; and after the said Rani he shall be the heir to and representative of the estate, etc., each and everything".

The appellant sued to recover possession of the taluqdari estate from Rani Rukman Kuwar and Gajadhar, on the ground that he was the eldest son and heir-at-law under the Mithakshara of the deceased talookdar, and was entitled to succeed under the provisions of Act I of 1869. With regard to the will, which was set up by the defendants, his contention was that, being unregistered, it was invalid, under S. 13 of Act I of 1869, with regard to the fourth wife, and that, if the gift to her failed, that to her son failed also.

Held that, upon the principle laid down by Lord Justice Turner in the case of Lainson v. Lainson, even if the gift to the fourth wife failed, intestacy did not result either in whole or in part, but the gift to her son in remainder was accelerated, and that the appellant had no valid claim to any interest in the estate. ———Estate in remainder or reversion—Validity.

As to the first life interest in J provided for by the will, it was said that Hindu law recognises only one entire estate in the land, and does not allow of that estate being cut up into smaller distinct interests in the way of life estate, reversion, remainder, and so forth. The objection amounts to this: that because there is, as was contended, only one estate technically known to Hindu law, and that an entirety, there can be no contract by which an owner of land may bind himself to allow to another the enjoyment of the usufruct of the land, to the exclusion of the owner, for a given time, whether for years or for life (because in the law we are dealing with the distinction of chattel and freehold has no existence), and te give exclusive right of possession for the enjoyment of that usufruct. It was admitted that annuities given and charged upon land are valid; but if the annuity equalled or exceeded the profits, there would be an effectual gift of all the profits and practically of the land, and yet it was contended that the possession and enjoyment of the land could not be directly given. Whether this interest and right of possession for years or life is called an estate or not, it as effectually excludes the general owner as an estate would. In the absence of any authority for so extaordinary a limitation of the right of property as would forbid a present parting with the exclusive possession and enjoyment for a time, their Lordships entertain no doubt that possession and enioyment may be so dealt with, and that there is no objection to a similar interest being given by will (74-5). In Seaton's case Parker J. stated as follows:—"Where there is a terminable life interest and there is a gift over on the happening of an event which does not take place, the Court will read this as a limitation in remainder on life interest which has determined by death."

The principle thus stated by Parker, J. is an old one; it is not confined to dispositions in favour of wives, or to the determinatien by remarriage of the interest given by the will, but it does depend on the possibility of ascertaining from other parts of the will that the original intention of the testator in making the gift was to give a limited interest only. In this case the Privy Council found that the intention of the testator was to confer on his half-brothers an estate of inheritance resembling an English estate in tail male, and held that that could not take effect. The question then arose as to what estate the brothers must be held to have taken. Their Lordships found that the testator intended to benefit his brothers personally; and that his gift to them and their heirs male would if valid have carried with it the enjoyment by each of his share during life. They therefore thought that that intention, though it was mixed up with the intention to give an estate tail, might lawfully take effect, and held that each of the brothers took an estate for his life (41-2, 43).

It was, however, suggested that a Court of construction might hold, in favour of the intention, that a fee simple or absolute interest was conferred by inapt words or dispositions, just as in English law an estate tail was often held to be conferred by inapt words or dispositions, because it came nearest to effecting the actual intentions of the testator. With reference to that contention their Lordships observed as follows :—" But if this testator intended not to give an absolute interest, which their Lordships hold to be clear from his introduction of heirs male, it is impossible to say that his intention is more defeated by the law which cuts down his gift in tail to a life interest, than it would be by straining the will to give an absolute interest, in which case the property might pass away from the family to a mortgagee, or a general creditor, or a stranger donee. The will in the case before their Lordships directed that trustees, after the legacies and annuities had been satisfied, were to convey to the persons entitled to the beneficial interest, subject to the subsequent limitations ' so far as the terms and condition of circumstances will permit, but so far only, as such limitations ' did not infringe any law then in force against perpetuities, "if any such law there shall be". The limitations were :

(1) To J. T. for life ;

(2) To his eldest son born during the testator's lifetime for life ;

(3) In strict settlement upon the first and other sons of such eldest son successively in tail male ;

(6) "After the failure or determination of the uses and estates hereinbefore limited" to S. T. for life ;

The will expressly and exclusively adopted primogeniture in the male line through males, preferring the eldest son, and excluding women and all right of provision or maintenance of either man or woman.

The question was whether J. T. took not merely an interest for life, but by construction of law an estate of inheritance, or whether such an estate of inheritance could be implied in favour of any of his successors.

Held, that no estate of inheritance other than the void estate in tail male could be read or deduced from the will (78).

A construction of the will giving such an estate of inheritance as the law would uphold and sanction upon J. T. would contradict the will in every particular. It would give the father a right of inheritance and a power of disposition when the will says that he shall only hold for life. It would give the succession from him to all his sons equally, where the will says that the eldest shall be preferred and have a separate estate of inheritance, and that until that estate fails, the second and so forth shall not succeed. It would give succession to women, whom the will excludes. It would let in rights of maintenance which the will negatives. It would let in the power of alienation, which the will forbids. It would defeat the limitation in case of non-residence. It would disregard the provisions as to leasing and improvement, which shew, in common with the rest of the will, that the intention of the testator was to give and to give only such an inheritance as would keep together the property inalienable so long as a male descended in a male line from any of the indicated sources of inheritance should be in existence, and should keep up state in the family mansion. There is no trace to be found in the will of an intention to create any other sort of estate ; and the will, as clearly as language can speak without express words, declar es that it was not the intention of the testator that any person to take thereunder should have the estate of inheritance defined by the ordinary law, To create such an estate by judicial construction of this will would be something worse than guesswork as to what the testator might have said if he could be asked his meaning; for it would be to contradict in every article what he has intelligibly expressed (77-8). In order to give effect to the general intention of the testator estates of inheritance will be inferred against the particular expression, in order to benefit as nearly as may be in a lawful way all whom the testator intended to benefit. ———Male descendants of donee—Estate of inheritance confined to—Validity of—Estate taken by donee in case of.

The material portion of the will of a Hindu was as follows: "My brother's sons J, T, and S, shall receive, for defrayment of the expenses of their pious acts, the following out of the properties left by me, to wit,....The said three nephews shall hold possession of the same in equal shares, and shall pay the Government revenue of the same into the Collectorate. They shall have no right to alienate the same by gift or sale; but they, their sons, grandsons, and other descendants in the male line, shall enjoy the same, and shall perform acts of piety as they respectively shall see fit for the spiritual welfare of our ancestors."

The High Court held, on the authority of "the Tagore case," that the testator, having attempted to create an estate of inheritance unknown to and opposed to Hindu Law, that estate of inheritance was void, and that the will operated only to confer on the planitiff an estate for life.

It was contended before their Lordships that the case was distinguishable from the Tagore case, on the ground that, in that case, the first estate given was in terms an estate for life; that in the present case (the appeal before their Lordships) if the words relating to succession, viz., "that their sons, grandsons, and other descendants in the male line shall enjoy the same, and shall perform acts of piety, as they respectively shall think fit, for the spiritual welfare of our ancestors," were struck out, and that the gift would be of an estate of inheritance; and that the intention of the testator to confer an estate of inheritance might be effectuated by striking out so much of the clause above quoted as excluded females from the succession.

Held that the contention was unsustainable (58).

Considering that the gift to the nephews is expressed as to be received for the defrayment of their pious acts, and that alienation is forbidden, their Lordships do not construe the gift, independently of the words prescribing the course of succession, as conferring an absolute estate. They are further of opinion that to alter the words prescribing the course of succession, so as to admit females, would be in effect to make a new will for the testator, and one which, so far from carrying his intentions into effect, would be in direct opposition to his intention, and indeed to his main object, expressed, in other parts of his will, as well as in this clause, viz., to exclude females (58-9). DECISION ON, BASED ON MEDICAL BOOKS AND JUDICIAL DICTA, AND NOT ON EVIDENCE IN THE CASE.

———The question was whether the deceased, who had been suffering from paralysis for a few years, was, at the time when he executed his third will on 10—7—1883, of sound and disposing mind.

The Judicial Commissioner, who held against the will on appeal, after an examination of the evidence, cited passages from the treatise of Dr. Ross on Diseases of the Nervous System, and Dr. Qain's Dictionary of Medicine, and then proceeded to quote various dicta of English Judges in cases of incapacity and insanity, which had little or no bearing upon the facts of the case before him. Under the influence apparently of those medical and legal authorities, and relying on the fact spoken to by a medical witness, that there had been extravasation of blood in the brain, he held that the deceased must, at the time when he made his third will, have had "a fresh access of his terrible malady."

Held that that speculative theory, for it was nothing else, illustrated the danger of deriving inferences of fact from edical books and judical dicta, instead of depending upon the facts established by the evidence in the case (181-2). (Lord Watson.) SAJID ALI AND WAJID ALI v. IBAD ALI.

———The question was as to the authenticity and genuineness of a will. The evidence was conflicting as to the mental capacity of the testator and as to the genuineness of his signature.

The leading facts as proved were as follows :—Iswar (the testator) appeared to have become ill at about eleven o'clock on the night of the 12th February, 1882, and died about three O'clock on the morning of the 15th February. The evidence assigned some time between nine and eleven O'clock on the evening of the 14th February as the time when he executed the will. The illness from which he suffered was a kind of fever known under the name sajor fever, which is attended with delirium and unconsciousness, but with intervals of consciousness. Eleven witnesses were examined against the will and about the same number in support of the will.

The District Judge decided in favour of the will. He had the opportunity of observing the demeanour and manner of the witnesses ; and, after reviewing the circumstances of the case, he came to apparently a clear conclusion in favour of the veracity of the witnesses who supported the will.

The High Court on appeal reversed the judgment of the District Judge, and held that the will was not a genuine will. The learned judges were influenced in their decision primarily by the evidence of two medical witnesses, and also by their own observation of the alleged signature of Ishwar to the will. No evidence was, however, given at the trial on the latter point, nor so far as appeared in the very careful judgment of the District Judge, was there any argument suggesting it.

On a consideration of the evidence and of the circumstances of the case, their Lordships reversed the judgment of the High Court and restored that of the District Judge. (Lord Morris.) ROMESH CHUNDER MUKERJEE v. RAJANI KANT MUKERII. (1893) 21 C. 1 = 6 Sar. 340.

The English Courts have gone what some might think pretty far on the question of what duty lies on those who propound a will. Those who propound a will must show that the will of which Probate is sought is the will of the testator, and that the testator was a person of testamentary capacity. In ordinary cases, if there is no suggestion to the contrary any man who is shown to have executed a will in ordinary form will be presumed to have testamentary capacity, but the moment the capacity is called in question then at once the onus lies on those propounding the will to affirm positively the testamentary capacity. Moreover, if a will is only proved in common and not in solemn form, the same rule applies even though the action is to attack a Probate which has been granted long ago. The Appellate Division of the Court of Ontario has, however, taken the view that once Probate is granted though only in common form, the onus is on him who seeks to set it aside.

PROOF OF.

———Quantum.

The question was as to the genuineness and validity of a will and codicil alleged to have been executed by a sonless Hindu bequeathing his ancestral as well as other real and personal estate, in the main, to certain charities, provision being made in it for the maintenance of his widow, daughter, and female relations. The appellant, the deceased's widow, contended that both the instruments were forged; and that at the time when they were respectively alleged to have been executed, the deceased was insensible.

Held, on the evidence affirming the court below, that the deeds in question were duly executed by the deceased and that he was in a sound disposing state of mind when he did so (343-4). (Mr. Pemberton Leigh.) NAGALUTCHMEE UMMAL v. GOPOO NADARAJA CHETTY.

Held, reversing the High Court, and restoring the District Judge, that the petitioner adduced sufficient evidence to establish the genuineness of the will and the capacity of the testator to make it, and that the evidence for the defence was not sufficient to destroy the petitioner's case on either of those points (143). In a case in which the question was as to the testamentary capacity of an alleged testator, their Lordships observed that it must be borne in mind that the alleged testator did not seem to have had any intention of making a will before his illness, and that the case before them was not like a case in which a testator executed a disposition of his property for which instructions had been given or preparations made while the mind was in vigour (116). In a case in which the question was whether a deceased person was in a sound and disposing state of mind when he executed a will and a deed-poll, it was suggested that the testator was too ill to stand the mental and physical fatigue of mastering the contents of the documents, or forming a judgment on them. With reference to this contention, their Lordships observed :—The testator was, no doubt, very ill and suffering from fever, and in fact in a more critical condition than he himself and those about him probably thought. And it is possible that he could not have stood the fatigue of mastering the whole contents and effect of a lengthy document like the will if it had been necessary for him to do so. But, in the opinion of their Lordships, he was quite capable of understanding and appreciating the effect of a short and comparatively simple document like the deed-poll, or a clause in the will such as the 26th clause (158). TRIAL JUDGE'S DECISION ON, BASED ON CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

———Interference in appeal with.

On an application for probate of a will, the question was whether the testator was in a sound and disposing state of mind when he executed the will. The District Judge, who saw the witnesses and observed their demeanour, found in favour of the will and granted probate. The High Court, on appeal, reversed his decision. The question was simply which set of witnesses should be believed.

Held, that the High Court, who had not the advantage of seeing the witnesses and observing their demeanour, ought not to have reversed the decision of the District Judge. ———On an application for probate of a will, an issue was raised as to whether the testator was of sound disposing mind when he executed the will. The trial Judge, who heard and saw the witnesses, held that the applicant had failed to prove that the testator was of sound disposing mind. The learned Judge correctly laid down for his own guidance the essentials of a "sound disposing mind." The Court of Appeal, who suffered under the disadvantage of neither seeing nor hearing the witnesses, nevertheless held that the onus on the plaintiff had been discharged, and admitted the will to probate.

Held, reversing the Court below, that the trial Judge was right in holding that the plaintiff had failed to discharge the burden of proof.

Their Lordships also observed on the impropriety of the Court of appeal reversing the conclusion of the trial Judge in such a case. (Lord Collins.) SHUNMUGAROYA MUDALIAR v. MANIKKA MUDALIAR.

A will is one of the most solemn documents known to the law. By it a dead man entrusts to the living the carrying out of his wishes, and as it is impossible that he can be called either to deny his signature or to explain the circumstances in which it was attached, it is essential that trustworthy and effective evidence should be given to establish compliance with the necessary forms of law. In the present instance, no formalities are essential. Proof of the testator's signature is all that is needed; but, in case of doubt or dispute, justice requires that the best evidence procurable of that signature should be furnished, and an attempt to support the signature by anything that falls short of this standard is a matter which, though it may not be fatal, is a serious defect. CONSIDERATION OF—IMPROPER WAY OF.

———Contents of will—Opinion formed from—Consideration of evidence in light of.

In a case in which the question was whether a will was or was not the last will of the testator, or was a forgery, the trial judge found that it was a forgery, doing so primarily from a consideration of the contents of the will, which he considered so extraordinary as to overbalance altogether the evidence of the witnesses who spoke to having been present and seen the testator sign the will, and to having themselves signed the will as witnesses.

Held, agreeing with the High Court, that the trial judge's method of procedure in discussing the question before him was an erroneous one, namely, first to make up his mind about the contents of the will, and then to look at the positive evidence in favour of its execution from that standpoint. ———Prepossession that testator could not have made particular will—Consideration of evidence influenced by.

In a case in which the question was whether a will set up by the widow and nephew of a deceased Hindu was really executed by the deceased or was a forgery, the case for the parties disputing the genuineness of the will was that the deceased had every intention of making a will but that he had intended to make a will in favour of a school, and that therefore the will set up was not the sort of will that he would have made. This notion that the deceased meant to make a will in favour of a school got so much into the mind of the trial judge that his judgment was swayed by that predominating opinion to begin with, and that he then looked at each witness with a sort of idea of trying to find out why the witnesses could not be reliable, instead of beginning with the witnesses and then seeing if there was any special reason why they should not be speaking the truth.

Their Lordships disapproved of the way in which the trial Judge approached the appreciation of the evidence of the witnesses. (Lord Dunedin). PALCHUR SANKARAREDDI v. PALCHUR MAHALAKSHMAMA. (1922) 17 L.W. 1 (5)= A.I.R. (1922) P.C. 315=31 M.L.T. 307 (P.C.)= 27 C.W N. 414=70 I.C. 949.

On an issue as to whether a paper writing alleged to to have been the last will of a lady was in fact executed by or on her behalf, held that the evidence of a person who was not a witness to the execution of the will, but merely deposed to having prepared the draft of the will had little or no bearing on the question whether or not the alleged will was in fact executed (704).

The Courts in India have attached more importance and significance to this document (the draft) than it deserves. There can be no doubt that the alleged will was based on it, and with such modifications as were necessary for the purpose in hand was in effect a reproduction of it. It might have been of distinct value if the issue had been whether the lady had understood an instrument admitted or proved to have been executed by her, or if her mental capacity had been questioned. ———Preparation of—Discrepancy as to—Effect of.

In support of the case that the will set up was not genuine, much stress was laid upon a discrepancy in the evidence adduced in proof of the will, viz., that the witnesses at the earlier judicial investigation described the will as having been immediately dictated by the testator to D, the writer; whereas at the trial of the cause (out of which the appeal before their Lordships arose), they deposed that T made the draft from the dictation of the testator, and that D made a fair copy from it. With reference to this point their Lordships observed as follows :—

This discrepancy certainly exists, but it is one which might be found in many a case free from suspicion. It may have proceeded from mere inaccuracy of recollection; and sometimes in native statements an intermediate agency is passed over, and an action ascribed to an immediate source, which in truth proceeded from a derivative one (99-100). In a case in which the High Court held against the genuineness of the will set up on the ground inter alia, that the evidence as to the draft of the will was suspicious and that it appeared that the draft produced so far from having been prepared beforehand had been made from the will itself, their Lordships, while recognising there were grave suspicions as to the preparation of the draft, held that, as there was a tendency amongst litigants in India, as elsewhere, to back up a good case by false evidence, the suspicious character of the story as to the draft did not destroy the evidence as to the execution of the will (632-3). EVIDENCE GIVEN IN OTHER PROCEEDINGS BY WITNESSES WHOM PARTY HAD NO OPPORTUNITY TO CROSS-EXAMINE—(Contd.)

On the death of R certain depositions were taken, not, however, in the suit out of which the appeal arose, but long before the institution of the suit; and it appeared that they were taken for an entirely distinct purpose, namely, in one case, for the purpose of the proceedings going on in the Civil Court, and, in the other case, for the purpose of the proceeding before the Collector. The object of the proceeding in the Civil Court was to substitute the name of the appellant for the name of R in all proceedings with respect to the property of the deceased in the Civil Court.

The object of the proceeding before the Collector was to have the name of the appellant registered instead of the name of R, as proprietor of his estate. It seemed that the Collector acted upon the will, and that then the Civil Court acted upon the decision of the Collector. It did not appear that the respondents had an opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses examined for the appellant in the said proceedings.

Held that neither the said proceedings nor the evidence given for the appellant therein were evidence in the suit upon the fact of the will being genuine or not genuine (284-5).

The decision of the Collector, of course, was not a proceeding in any Court of Justice at all; it was a not a judicial proceeding, and, by the Regulation VIII of 1800, it is expressly provided that the entry of the Collector shall not in any degree "affect the rights of any party whose name may be registered therein as the ostensible proprietor of the land, or whose name may not have been registered as the proprietor, but who may establish a right of property in the Dewanny Adawlut, or otherwise" (285). MEDICAL OFFICER WHO ATTENDED ON TESTATOR.

———Reading over of will to—Evidence of witnesses as to—Medical Officer himself not recollecting occurrence—Effect.

In a case in which the genuineness of a will was in question, it was alleged by the witnesses for the will that during the night in which the will was executed, the night before the testator's death, Dr. D, who was said to be a gentleman of good position was called in to attend the testator, and was present, when the will was read over. But the Doctor when called could recollect no such occurrence.

The District Judge, who held against the genuineness of the will, attached great importance to that discrepancy. The High Court, who reversed him, thoug t it not unnatural that that gentleman might have forgotten a single visit to a patient after the lapse of many years (the will was executed in 1878 and the question of its genuineness arose in 1896).

TESTATOR'S SUBSEQUENT STATEMENTS CONSISTENT OR INCONSISTENT WITH EXECUTION.

———Value of.

In a case in which the question was whether a deceased Rajah had executed the will set up by the respondent, his grandfather, both parties were agreed that the deceased intended, to make a will before he died, ousting the succession of his heirs and settling his whole estates upon the respondent and her mother in terms of the will set up. But, while the appellants, the heirs ab intestato, contended that the deceased had put off the formal execution of the intended will till after his installation as Rajah and that he did not formally execute it on the date of the will set up, the respondent, on the other hand, insisted that he had on the date in question executed the document and delivered it as a completed and effectual instrument to the respondent.

Held that, while, on the one hand, statements made by the deceased after the date of the will set up showing his belief that he had not yet barred the succession of his legal heirs, and did not mean to do so before his installation, would militate strongly against the inference that it had already been formally executed, it was, on the other hand, equally clear that statements made by the deceased during the same period, amounting to an acknowledgment that he had executed the document and delivered it as a completed and effectual instrument to the respondent, would afford a strong corroboration of her oral testimony, which, according to the appellants, was perjured (18-9). ———Evidence of execution clear and satisfactory—Degree of improbability required to prevail against.

The case of the respondents (that the deceased Rajah executed the will in question) is clearly and satisfactorily proved. The settled intention of the deceased to make a will in the precise terms of the instrument propounded is beyond dispute; there is a large and consistent body of testimony evidencing the preparation of the draft will, the making of a clean copy, the signing and sealing of that copy by the testator, and its attestation by the subscribing witnesses. There is consistent and uncontradicted testimony that the testator, as soon as these acts were completed, delivered the instrument, as a valid and legally executed instrument, to his legatee; and there is also evidence to the effect that he subsequently acknowledged that all these acts had been performed. The theory of improbability remains to be considered. In order to prevail against such evidence as the above, an improbability must be clear and cogent. It must approach very nearly to, if it does not altogether constitute, an impossibility (23). (Lord Watson.) CHOTEY NARAIN SINGH v. RATAN KOER.

———Will not sort of will likely to have been made by testator—Argument against genuineness based on—Force of—Testamentary intention of testator admitted.

The question was as to the genuineness of a will executed in favour, chiefly. of the wife's sister's son of the alleged testator. The genuineness of the will was contested by the reversionary heirs of the deceased. Their case was not that the deceased had no intention of making a will at all; that he meant to die intestate. On the contrary, they rather put in the forefront that the deceased had every intention of making a will, and there was a great deal of evidence that there was a certain amount of hearsay that he had some intention of devoting a very large portion of his fortune to a charity in connection with a school for boys. That being a rather difficult position for the reversioners to put themselves into, because the moment that they asserted that there was another will they put themselves out of Court, because their only right to prevail was upon intestacy, they, therefore, rather hinted that it was most likely that the deceased would make a will, and then went on to say it was pretty apparent from the evidence that if the testator did make a will, the one in question was not the sort of will that he would have made.

Their Lordships observed that the reversioners were in rather a curious position, which was really the old position of wishing to wound and being afraid to strike (4-5). ———Method proper of approaching — Investigation of actual facts of case—Pious Hindu gentleman—Point of view of—Consideration of issue from—Propriety.

It is little wonder that the District Judge and the learned Judges of the High Court have come to opposite conclusions on the question of the genuineness of the will, for they approach the matter from very different points of view. Patiently and with every appearance of impartiality the District Judge sets himself to investigate the actual facts. He tries to place himself in the position of the alleged testator with all his actual surroundings. On the other hand, Ameer Ali, J. who claims to be intimately acquainted with the usages and habits of thought of his Hindu fellow-countrymen, approaches the question from the point of view apparently of a pious Hindu gentleman, scrupulous and exact in the discharge of every moral and religious duty—so scrupulous in deed and so exact that, in the opinion of the learned Judge, it becomes a matter of grave importance that no provision is to be found in the will for the worship of a family idol whose worship, as it appears, was maintained during the testator's lifetime by the annual expenditure of the sum of one rupee. Tried by so high a standard, the will is found wanting in many things. But for all that it is not an unlikely disposition for such a man as the testator to have made under the circumstances (31). before his death, the District Judge, who had the opportunity of observing the demeanour and manner of the witnesses, after reviewing the circumstances of the case came to a clear conclusion in favour of the veracity of the witnesses who supported the will. On appeal his judgment was reversed on the ground, inter alia, that, from the appellate Judges' own observation of the signature of the deceased to the will, it (the signature) did not seem to be the signature of a dying man and its character supported the evidence of the witnesses who said that the signature was attached by one H after the testator's death. On further appeal held by their Lordships that they could not attach much importance to that ground of reversal of the District Judge's judgment because no evidence had been given at the trial on that point and there was no argument suggesting it. It is said that the word "execution" in reference to a will applies to the testator's part alone; for it is said that the testator executes, the witnesses attest. But this is utterly untrue. The testator does not execute; he makes and publishes. In truth, the word execute applies to a deed, rather than to a will. The word "execution" in reference to a will designates the whole operation, including both the signature or acknowledgment of a testator, and the attestation of the subscribing witnesses. It is not used at all to designate the testator's part alone (406-7). (Lord Brougham.) CASEMENT v. FOULTON. (1845) 3 M. I. A. 395 = 5 Moo. P.C. 130 = 1 Sar. 293.

The absence from the witness-box of the other attesting witnesses has been satisfactorily explained. The hearing of the case was not continuous. There was other pressing work to be attended to by the court, which necessitated several adjournments in the taking of the evidence. The recording of the evidence began before one Subordinate Judge and was concluded by another. Most of the attesting witnesses who were not examined appear to have been present to give their evidence on one or more of the dates fixed for the recording of evidence, but owing to the pressure of work in the court they were not examined. It does not appear that any of them lived near the court, and there is nothing to suggest to their Lordships that any of them were intentionally kept out of the witness-box by the appellant (the propounder of the will the genuineness of which was in question) (630). LAPSE OF TIME—GENUINENESS ATTACKED AFTER LONG.

———Recognition and acting upon of will with knowledge of parties interested in disputing it—Presumption favourable from.

A Hindu testator by his will gave authority to his widow, with the consent of his mother, to adopt a son ; in pursuance of which a son was adopted, and the other provisions of the will were acquiesced in by the family for twenty-seven years, when a suit was brought by one of the testator's heirs claiming the estate then in possession of the adopted son on the ground that the adoption was invalid. Held that there arose from all the circumstances of the case a very strong presumption, which their Lordships did not feel themselves at liberty to disregard, in favour of the will.

No doubt these circumstances, as the law stands, are not conclusive against the plaintiff. He has the right to call upon the defendant to prove his title ; but their Lordships cannot but feel that while he has that extreme right, every allowance that can be fairly made for the loss of evidence during this long period, by death or otherwise—every allowance which can account for any imperfection in the evidence —ought to be made; and, on the other hand, that in testing the credibility of the evidence which is actually given, great weight should be given to all those inferences and persumptions which arise from the conduct of the family with respect to the will and to the acts done by them under the will. The case seems to be analogous to one in which the legitimacy of a person in possession is questioned, a very considerable time after his possession has been acquired, by a party who has a strict legal right to question his legitimacy. In such a case the defendant, in order to defend his status, should be allowed to invoke against the claimant every presumption which, reasonably arises from the long recognition of his legitimacy by members of the family or other persons. The case of a Hindu claiming by adoption is perhaps as strong as any case of the kind that can be put ; because when under a document which is supposed and admitted by the whole family to be genuine, he is adopted, he loses the rights—he may lose them altogether—which he would have in his own family; and it would be most unjust after long lapse of time to deprive him of the status which he has acquired in the family into which he has been introduced, except upon the strongest proof of the alleged defect in his title. If there was any reasonable cause for doubting the evidence as to the execution of the will the delay in presenting the will to the court might possibly raise some suspicion as to the genuineness of the will, but their Lordships are satisfied on the evidence that the will which has been propounded is the genuine will of the testator. ———Father—Will bequeathing self-acquired properties in favour of eldest son.

The circumstances of the case are strongly in favour of the will. It contains such a disposition of the testator's property as it was extremely probable that he should make, and extremely unlikely that the appellant should introduce into a forged instrument. The testator was of great age. He had placed his eldest son in his place with respect to the management of all his affairs in his lifetime. He might, very naturally, desire to keep together in his family the wealth which he had acquired by his own exertions, and to prevent its dispersion by division amongst his sons. His eldest son had issue, his other sons had none. The witnesses in favour of the will are in general less open to exception than is usual in Indian cases, and some of them entirely unexceptionable. The Zillah Judge who has seen them has come to an opinion in favour of the will.

Their Lordships accordingly reversed the Sudder Court, and restored the Zillah Judge (122). (Lord Kingsdown.) NANA NARAIN RAO v. HUREE PUNTH BHAO, ———Forgery—Opposing case of—Failure of—Effect.

In this case, their Lordships reversed the decision of the High Court which held that the will set up was not proved, and restored that of the trial Judge. The grounds of their Lordships decision are contained in the following extract from their Judgment :—

The will had been provod, though ex parte ; it had been acted on very recently after the testator's death, and possession held for a considerable time under it. There appears to have been no desire on the part of P (the beneficiary under the will and the brother of the testator) to escape from the publicity and responsibility attending the proof of such a document. In fact, it was not drawn into question so long as P himself lived. That apparent acquiescence is attempted to be ascribed to a general and enduring ignorance, which is in itself eminently improbable. The will is met by district allegations of fraud and forgery, the witnesses to which are discredited by both Courts Besides this, the case of the plaintiff does, in the several parts of it commented upon, bear the appearance not simply of exaggeration, but of conscious untruth. Whatever might have been the result of this case, had these presumptions in support of the case for the will been wanting, the ordinary support which the failure of an opposing case lends to the case which it impeaches, with the presumptions arising against the opposing case from the introduction into it of matters too grossly improbable for belief, and not the subject of innocent mistake, must be applied on a review of the whole evidence in the cause, to support the factum of this will (105-6). ———Quantum—Adoption by testator—Will declaring, and bequeathing property to him.

Held, affirming the High Court, which had reversed the court below, that a will alleged to have been executed by a childless Hindu, the effect of which was to declare that he had adopted a son of his elder brother, and to devise and bequeath all his real and personal property to that adopted son, had been sufficiently proved (256).

The will is one which it is highly probable that a man under the circumstances of the deceased would make. There is a great body of evidence in support of it which appears to preponderate over the evidence against it; among the evidence in support of it is that, among others, of the family medical man, and of a relation who appeared to have the confidence of both the factions into which the family of the deceased appears to have been divided, and to have been required to arbitrate between them The will was published and made known almost immediately after the death of the testator; and the adoption of the child which he declares in the will he has made was also made public and insisted upon. Other members of the family, even those who now oppose the will, recognised the adopted child in various judicial proceedings. They brought actions in which they associated his name with theirs, and one of them, who now

The plaintiff appellant was the widow and sole heir-at-law of a deceased Hindu, and claimed to recover all the property, moveable and immoveable, of the deceased in that rights. The respondents were trustees under a will and codicil alleged by them to have been executed by the deceased bequeathing his properties, in the main, to certain charities. The appellant denied the genuineness and validity of both instruments. The appellant had also alleged that her husband had enjoined her, in the event of the child with which she was pregnant, at his death, not proving to be a male, to adopt a son to be chosen by herself, and it was thought that the alleged power to adopt and the testamentary dispositions were so inconsistent with each other that they could not stand together. No adoption had, in fact, ever been made in pursuance of the power. The question was whether the evidence as to the power of adoption was so strong as to induce their Lordships, upon that ground, to disbelieve the testimony in favour of the will and codicil, which certainly were not very consistent with it.

Held, that the evidence as to the power to adopt was not so strong as to induce their Lordships, upon that ground, to disbelieve the testimony in favour of the will and codicil (343-4). (Mr. Pemberton Leigh.) NAGALUTCHMEE UMMAL v. GOPOO NADARAJA CHETTY.

Will—Execution of—Trial Judge's decision as to—Reversal in appeal of.

———Evidence—Decision in favour of execution based on—Reversal of, on comparison of signature of testator by appellate court—No point made about signature at trial.

The defence to an application for probate of a will alleged to have been executed by a deceased person was, inter alia, that the deceased was in such a state of mental and physical incapacity as to be unfit to make a will on the date when he was alleged to have done so. An anumati patra was also alleged to have been executed by the deceased at the same time as the will.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Will—Execution of—Trial Judge's decision as to—Reversal in appeal of—(Contd.)

The District Judge held on the evidence that probate ought not to be refused either on account of the incapacity of the testator at the time of the alleged execution of the will, or on any other ground.

On appeal the High Court reversed the decision of the District Judge, substantially on the ground that, on the day when the will was alleged to have been executed, the deceased was incapable mentally and physically of performing such an act. The learned Judges observed that the question upon which the truth of the will turned was really whether the testator had become so weakened by the fever that he was incapable of signing the will in the way it was signed. They observed in their judgment that there was a fact of which the District Judge had taken no notice whatever, and that was the character of the signatures. They went on to observe that the will was signed in six or seven places, and the anumati patra was also signed in several places, and having examined those signatures they expressed the opinion that they were to all appearances those of a vigorous man, being perfectly clear and even and all alike, and that circumstance, it was explained, had greatly influenced the judgment of the High Court. The District Judge's omission to take notice of the characters of the signatures was fully accounted for by the fact that the point was not made the subject of examination in the evidence, or of observation in the argument, so far as appeared.

Held, that the fact that there was an entire absence of any question or answer in the evidence bearing on the nature of the handwriting of the signatures was a circumstance of very much importance (141, 143). (Mr. Shand.) BAMA SOONDARI DEBI v. TARA SOONDARI DEBI.

———The question was to the authenticity and genuineness of a will. The alleged testator died about three o'clock on the morning of the 15th February. The evidence assigned some time between nine and eleven o'clock on the evening of the 14th February as the time when he executed the will.

The District Judge in a full, clear, and exhaustive judgment decided in favour of the will. He had the opportunity of observing the demeanour and manner of the witnesses. After reviewing the circumstances of the case he came to apparently a clear conclusion in favour of the veracity of the witnesses who supported the will.

On appeal before the Chief Justice and another learned Judge, they reversed the judgment of the District Judge, and held that the will was not a genuine will. The Chief Justice, who gave the judgment of the Court, appeared to have been influenced in his decision by his own observation of the alleged signature of the testator to the will. He said: "The signature does not seem to be the signature of a dying man, and the character of the signature supports the evidence of the witnesses who said that the signature was attached by H after the testator's death."

No evidence was, however, given at the trial on that point, nor was there any argument suggesting it.

Held, under the circumstances, that much importance could not be attached to that ground of the reversal of the District Judge's judgment (5-6). (Lord Morris.) ROMESH CHUNDER MUKERJI v. RAJANI KANT MUKERJI.

on appeal, the ratio decidendi, or at least the turning point in the minds of the appellate Judges being the impression which they derived from the inspection of a particular letter in the Bengalee language. That point was taken before the trial Judge also, but he thought there was nothing in it. The evidence as to the absolute prostration and insensibility of the testator at the time of the alleged execution of the will had been discredited. But the appellant's—he being the party who set up the will—own witnesses stated that the testator put the letter in question, feeling too weak to write his name in full.

Held, reversing the High Court and restoring the trial Judge, that the impression formed by the appellate Judges from the inspection of the letter jn question was a very unsafe ground of decision (84).

It is impossible, from the mere inspection of the letter, as it appears to their Lordships, to be able to predicate with any degree of certainty or accuracy, that he was too weak to make the impression with his pen which he is said to have made. It is impossible to say what momentary rally of strength might take place to do an act of such brevity as that, and, therefore, their Lordships are unable to give to that, which is after all merely the impression of these two Judges derived from actual inspection, the weight which has been given to it (84). Where the question was whether a will was executed by the testator or not and the suggestion was made that there might have been a blank sheet of paper signed by the testator which might have been made use of for the purpose of getting up a will and in proof of the suggestion various forms were produced and admitted in evidence by the Court below, forms signed by people other than the testator and with none of which the testator had anything to do, held that such evidence was not relevant and should not have been admitted. Where the District Judge built up the theory that the will (the genuineness and validity of which were in question) had been written on blank pages over signatures of the testator previously obtained, relying mainly upon the circumstance that when the will was examined it appeared that the last page had the writing inconveniently crowded above the signature of the testator, and the last page but one had also at the foot of the page writing so placed as to lend colour to the suggestion that the page had been filled up after the signature had been attached, held, on the evidence in and the probabilities of the case, that whatever might be the true cause of the inconvenient way in which some of the writing in the will appeared the explanation was not and could not be the one that the learned Judge assigned ; and that it would indeed be most unsafe and most undesirable in the circumstances of the case to try to spell out from the peculiar form in which a document written in the vernacular appeared a hypothetical answer to the clear, distinct, and trustworthy evidence in support of the will. The other evidence is hardly deserving of notice. It consists of that sort of testimony with which, in these Indian cases, we are unfortunately too familiar—of witnesses who swear positively to matters of which they can have no knowledge ; of witnesses who swear that they have heard the alleged testator, after the date of his will, declare that he had never made one; that they had heard the persons who had been parties to them gratuitously declare to them that it was a forgery ; of witnesses who declare that they had been solicited by the party in the cause, or his agents, to attest instruments, which they were told at the same time were fabricated. ———Attestor who says he attested without knowledge of actual execution on persuasion that will was for his benefit or believing document to be a forgery—Credibility of.

In a case in which the genuineness of a will was in question a subscribing witness, when examined as a witness, said that though his name did appear upon the document, it had been added some twenty days after the death of the testator at the instigation of the mother of the testator, who told him that the arrangement was for the benefit of his future son, and that her consent was necessary to any adoption. He did not venture to express a conviction one way or the other as to the truth or falsehood of the will.

DISPOSITIONS BY—LAWS OF—ANALOGY BETWEEN.

———It is too late to contend that, because the ancient Hindoo treatises make no mention of wills, a Hindoo cannot maks a testamentary disposition of his property. Decided cases, too numerous to be now questioned, have determined that the testamentary power exists, and may be exercised, at least within the limits which the law prescribes to alienation by gift inter vivos (37-8). ———The introduction of gifts by will into general use has followed in India, as it has done in other countries, the conveyance of property inter vivos. The same may be said of the Roman law in which the testamentary power, apart from public sanction, appears to have been a development of the law of gifts inter vivos. Such a disposition of property, to take effect upon the death of the donor, though revocable in his lifetime, is, until revocation, a continuous act of gift upto the moment of death, and does then operate to give the property disposed of to the persons designated as beneficiaries. They take upon the death of the testator as they would if he had given the property to them in his lifetime (68). (Mr. Justice Willes.) JUTTENDROMOHUN TAGORE v. GANENDROMOHUN TAGORE.

———Extent and limits of.

There is no law expressly and in terms applicable to persons who can take under a gift by will. The analogous law in this case is to be found in that applicable to gifts and even if wills were not universally to be regarded in all respects as gifts to take effect upon death, they are generally so to be regarded as to the property which they can transfer, and the persons to whom it can be transferred (68-9). DISPOSITIONS BY—POWERS OF.

———If co-extensive.

It was argued that in all cases where a man is able to dispose of his property by act, inter vivos, he may do so by will; that he cannot do so when he has a son, because the son, immediately on his birth, becomes co-parcener with the father; that the objection to bequeathing ancestral property is founded on the Hindu notion of an undivided family; but that when there are no males in the family the liberty of bequeathing is unlimited. It is not necessary for their Lordships to lay down so broad a proposition (345). (Mr. Pemberton Leigh.) NAGALUTCHMEE UMMAL v. GOPOO NADARAJA CHETTY. (1856) 6 M. I. A. 309 = 1 Sar. 543.

———The authorities which engrafted the testamentary power upon the Hindu law have treated a devise as a gift to take effect on the testator's death, some of them affirming the broad proposition that what a man can give by act inter vivos he may give by will (194).

On the above principle it was argued that the decisions having recognised the validity of an alienation by a co-parcener of his undivided share by gift or other voluntary conveyance inter vivos it followed as a necessary consequence that a will by him disposing of such share was also valid.

Their Lordships refused to extend the power of alienation of the co-parcener on the basis of the principle relied upon (194). (Sir James Colvile.) LAKSHMAN DADA NAIK v. RAMACHANDRA DADA NAIK. (1880) 7 I. A. 181 = 5 B. 48 (61) = 7 C.L.R. 320 = 4 Sar. 173 = 3 Suth. 778.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Will—Gift inter vivos or—(Contd.)

V, who was the owner of considerable properties and had no male child, resolved to adopt the plaintiff, and executed a document in connection with his proposed adoption, inter alia, in the following terms:—

The will executed by V to the boy adopted by me (plaintiff) is as follows:—As I have no male heir though I married two wives, as I have been falling ill very frequently, as my family is a respectable family entitled for several generations to respect, for that purpose and for enjoying the property and in regard to another consideration, viz., that for obtaining the fruit of this birth, according to the Hindu Shastras, it would not do without a male child, I have, out of my free will, executed this will pursuant to the request of my castemen and after consultation with my mother and my wives. And you are to conduct yourself according to it as follows:—

From this day forward you shall be my child and live with me; and out of the properties belonging to me and included in my patta, the properties in Schedules I and II hereto my mother should enjoy as usual; those in Schedule III my sister should enjoy as usual; all the other properties in Schedule 1V and included in my patta you are to live with me and enjoy; if perhaps, I should die, you are to live with my mother and first wife and you are to perform the funeral ceremonies for me, my mother, and my wives, spending money according to our position.

Then followed terms as to how the plaintiff should conduct himself in regard to V's mother, and his two wives, and what provisions he should make for the marriage of V's daughter, and in certain other events detailed in the document, and also for payment of V's creditors.

V did not adopt the plaintiff as he had intended to do.

Held that the document was not of a testamentary character in any respect, and that, if it had any legal effect whatever, it was of the nature of a transaction inter vivos, and, not being registered, was invalid and gave no title to the plaintiff. Their Lordships had, however, great doubts whether the document purported to be anything more than a declaration of the intended adoption of the plaintiff and a statement of the wishes of V thereafter.

The only words contained in the document which would support its being regarded as a document of a testamentary character are that in some places it styles itself a will. But calling a document a will does not make it so. (Lord Moulton.) TIRUGNANAPAL v. PONNAMMAI NADATHI.

Will—Gift inter vivos or—(Contd.)

On May 26,1883, the taluqdar executed a will stating that he had adopted L and giving him the entire taluqa, but making provision for the event of his leaving a natural-born son.

On May 29,1883, S executed a registered deed stating that he had relinquished the property and all proprietary rights acquired by him under the deed of June 1,1878, in favour of the taluqdar.

On April 28,1886, the taluqdar effected mutation of names in respect of the taluqa (except the villages dedicated to the endowment of the temple) in favour of L on an application which stated that if L's connection with the estate should be severed during the taluqdar's lifetime then the whole estate would revert to him. Mutation of names in the case of the villages excepted followed on a supplementary application by the taluqdar.

On May 5, 1887, the taluqdar executed the deed in question. In the last paragraph, the taluqdar declared that he had written the deed "by way of a deed of adoption and codicil to a will in order to amend and rectify the deed of May 26, 1883, by adding some necessary provisions to it." The deed in the main was clearly testamentary in its character, but there were two paragraphs which were relied upon as showing that the deed was a deed of gift inter vivos. Paragraph 6 began by stating that he (the taluqdar) had had the instrument of June 1, 1878, cancelled and destroyed with the consent of S, and S had again put him in possession of the estate. The taluqdar then declared that after getting possession he had made over the whole of the said property to his adopted son (L) and had absolutely and unconditionally relinquished all rights and proprietorship as well as ceased interference with the property, and he (the taluqdar) concluded the paragraph by saying, "therefore neither S himself nor his representatives have any right left to make a claim under the deed of June 1,1878." In clause 8, the taluqdar described L as "my adopted son, and donee and legatee under the deed of May 26,1883, as well as under this deed....in respect of all my moveable and immoveable property which has already been acquired, or which may be acquired hereafter during my lifetime or which may come to me by inheritance or to which I may become entitled."

"Whereas my husband, during his lifetime, bequeathed the entire property of the aforesaid ilaqa to me, and I, in accordance with the said will, am in possession and ownership of the same, now I make a gift of the movable and immovable property, the entire Zamindari and lambardari estate, etc., in favour of L, the detail whereof is being given below, with the exception of the villages and sir lands, etc., of the estates, specified below, which shall, during my lifetime, remain in my and my relation's possession, free of rent and without payment of Government revenue ; and I do hereby invest the donee with the power to have the mutation of names effected in his favour. villages and sir lands, which have been exempted hereunder, for my lifetime without the power of alienation by mortgage, sale and gift ; and after me, the donee shall also be the owner of the said exempted property. The donee shall pay the Government revenue of the exempted estate from the ilaqa with the exception of the revenue of Patti village G, which I shall pay out of my own pocket. The donee shall pay all the debt with which the estate is encumbered—I, the donor having nothing to do therewith."

The document concluded with three lists—namely, of the gifted immovable property, the gifted movable property, and the "property exempted", the third list contained the following : Mauza Mundia Misir, Patti G, Gungipur (standing in the name of Mahomed Ibrahim Khan), and sir land at Jalalpur.

Held, affirming the Court below, that the deed must be construed as a deed of gift and not as a will.

The deed was intended to be and to operate as an immediate and irrevocable disposition of all the widow's movable and immovable property, and all her Zamindari and lambardari estate mentioned in the deed and in the schedules to it, subject to the reservation for her own use during her lifetime of the usufruct of the property in question here (namely, the excepted villages and sir lands). Will—Gift over.

———(See also HINDU LAW—GIFT—GIFT OVER).

———Accretion to devised estate—Devolution of—If follows capital or devolves according to law.

By his will a Hindu bequeathed his property to his sons with a direction that the share which each son took, and which would have gone to his heirs according to the Hindu law, was, in the case of any one of his sons leaving no son, to go to the other sons. It appeared clearly from the expressions used by the testator that the corpus of the share of any of the sons dying without leaving a son was to go to the surviving sons. The question was, whether the share of profits made during the joint lives of the sons which belonged to the deceased son followed his share of the capital and went over to the other sons, or, whether it devolved upon his heir-at-law, his widow.

Held that, on the true construction of the will, the testator had not attempted to dispose of those profits, which were the property of the son dying without leaving a son, that it was his intention not to touch the question of profits, but to leave them to go as they would go, according to law, and that the share of the surplus profits of the deceased son went to his heirs-at-law (63). "Cl. 8. If the death of my wife should take place before my grand-daughter (daughter's daughter) arrives at majority and bears a son, then the whole of the estate shall remain in charge of the Court of Wards until she arrives at majority and bears a son.

" Cl. 9. If my grand-daughter (daughter's daughter) should be barren, or a sonless widow, or if she should be otherwise disqualified, she shall not become entitled to my property, but shall receive an allowance of Rs. 300 per mensem for life."

Held, that clause 9 of the will should be read in conjunction with that which preceded it, and that the death of the widow should be treated as the time when it was, if at all, to take effect (62).

which had formed the share of his deceased brother, and for an injunction restraining his brother's widow from denying his title, He did not, however, ask for possession of that property.

The Sub-Judge held that the prayer for an injunction was a sufficient compliance with the requirements of S. 42 of the Specific Relief Act, and that objection could not be taken to the form of the suit on the ground that the plaintiff did not ask for possession of the property.

———Event which is to take place if at all, immediately on close of life in being at time of execution of will—Gift over on—Validity.

The will of a Hindu testator, after devising all his real and personal estate among his five sons (a joint undivided family) contained this clause:—"Should any among my said five sons die, not leaving any son from his loins, nor any son's son, in that event neither his widow, nor his daughter, nor his daughter's son, nor any of them, will get any share out of the share that he has obtained of the immoveables and moveables of my said estate. In that event of the said property, such of my sons and my son's son as shall then be alive, they will receive that wealth according to their respective shares. If any one acts repugnant to this, it is inadmissible."

It was found that upon the true construction of the will the property was given over upon the death of any one of his sons without leaving male issue at the time of his death, that is, upon an event which was to take place, if at all, immediately on the close of a life in being at the time when the will was made, and the question was whether the Hindu law prohibited such a provision.

Held, that the testator, in making that provision, did not infringe or exceed the powers given him by the Hindu law, and that the clause effectually gave the corpus of the property to the surviving sons immediately on the death of that son who died without leaving male issue (135-6).

There is nothing against public convenience, nothing generally mischievous, and nothing against the principles of Hindu law in allowing a testator to give property, whether by way of remainder, or by way of executory bequest (to borrow terms from the law of England), upon an event which is to happen, if at all, immediately on the close of a life in being. There would be great general inconvenience and public mischief in denying such a power (135). (Lord Justice Knight Bruce.) SREEMUTTY SOORJEEMONEY DOSSEE v. DENOBUNDOO MULLICK.

———Failure or determination of estate—Gift over after—Failure or determination of estate in law and not in fact—Gift over if takes effect in case of.

The will the construction of which was in question directed that trustees, after the legacies and annuities had been satisfied, were to convey to the persons entitled to the beneficial interest, subject to the subsequent limitations ' so far as the terms and condition of circumstances will permit, but so far only, as such limitations ' did not infringe any law then in force against perpetuities, ' if any such law there shall be.' The limitations were :

(1) To J. T. for life ;

(2) To his eldest son born during the testator's life-time for life ;

(3) In strict settlement upon the first and other sons of such eldest son successively in tail male ;

(4) Similar limitations for life and in tail male upon the other sons of J. T. born in the testator's life-time ;

(5) Limitations in tail male upon the sons of J. T. born after the testator's death.

(6) " After the failure or determination of the uses and estates hereinbefore limited " to S. T. for life ;

On the true construction of the will their Lordships held that J. T. took a life estate only. The question arose as regards the succession after the determination of J.T.'s life-estate.

It may be urged that, as there was at the death of the testator no person to take under the first series of limitations except J. T., and no person who came into existence afterwards could in point of law so take, there was in law a " failure " of the estates at the death of the testator, which no subsequent event could affect, and that the interest for life after the death of J. T. then became vested in S. T.

The answer is that this argument proceeds upon the assumption that " failure or determination " means failure or determination in law, as if the testator contemplated that his will might be void in law, which, as to the limitations in question, save as to the possible effect of a law against perpetuities, their Lordships see no sufficient ground upon the face of the will for supposing that he suspected (79). Construing the will their Lordships understand " failure or determination " to mean " failure or determination " in fact of an estate or estates which the testator considered sufficient in law, and that the limitations over were in the scheme of the will to follow the creation of the prior estates of inheritance and must fall therewith. The property therefore next goes to G. T. as heir-at-law (80). (Mr. Justice Willes.) JUTTENDROMOHUN TAGORE v. GANENDROMOHUN TAGORE. (1872) Sup. I.A. 47 = 9 B. L. R. 377 = 18 W. ———Future and contingent interests under—Release of—Deed effecting.

The appellant, M & N were three legatees under a will, entitled in equal shares to the residuary estate of the testator. N died without issue, having bequeathed all his estates to M. The appellant instituted the suit out of which the appeal arose to establish his right to a moiety of the estate taken by N under the said will. His case was that the will made a gift over of N's share under it to himself & M in the event of N's death without issue.

It appeared that, prior to N's death, all three of them effected a separation of their interests derived from the will, and that they executed certain deeds of conveyance or release, the operative part of the leading instrument being as follows :—

" They, the said G " (the appellant) "and M do and each of them doth by these presents grant, bargain, sell, aliene, and release, and by way of conveyance only and not by way of warranty of title, do and each of them doth also grant and confirm unto the said N, his heirs, representatives, and assigns, the parcels of land therein particularly described, and all the estate, right, title, interest, use, trust, property, possession, possibility, claim, and demand whatsoever, both at law and in equity of them etc." The property dealt with by that deed was the one-third share of N under the will.

Held that the above-mentioned instruments operated to pass every interest of every kind which the appellant had or could claim to have in the shares allotted to M & N, and that, so long as those instruments stood, it was impossible for the appellant to contend with success that any interest, future or contingent, was reserved to him (37).

The object of the parties, as evidenced by the deeds, was once for all to dispose finally of the testator's estate, and of all questions connected with it (37). (Lord Macnaghten.) GREENDER CHUNDER GHOSE v. TROYLUCKHONAUTH GHOSE. (1892) 21 I. A. 35 = 20 C. 373 = 6 Sar. 267.

———Male issue—Failure of—Gift over in event of—Indefinite failure of such issue or failure thereof at time of death of legatee.

The will of a Hindoo Testator, after devising all his real and personal estate among his five sons (a joint undivided family) contained this clause: " Should any among my said five sons die, not leaving any son from his loins, nor any son's son, in that event neither his widow, nor his daughter, nor his daughter's sons, nor any of them, will get any share out of the share that he has obtained of the immoveables and moveables of my said estate. In that event of the said property, such of my sons and my son's sons as shall then be alive, they will receive that wealth according to their respective shares. If any one acts repugnant to this, it is inadmis sible. However, if my sonless son shall leave a widow, in that event she will only receive Co's Rs. 10,000 for her food and raiment."

The question was whether, according to the true construction of that clause, the testator pointed to an indefinite failure of male issue of any one of his sons whose male issue should fail, or failure of male issue at the time of his death.

Held that it was perfectly plain that that to which the testator pointed in the clause was not an indefinite failure of male issue, but a failure of male issue of any of his sons at the time of the death of that son (134 5). (Lord Justice Knight Bruce.) SREEMUTTY SOORJEEMONEY DOSSEE v. DENOBUNDOO MULLICK. (1862) 9 M.I.A. 123 = 1 Suth. 291 = 1 Sar. 837.

———Nephews and their male descendants—Gift to—Gift over on death of "any of them" without leaving male issue—Death of any of nephews alone or of his male descendants also contemplated.

The material portion of the will of a Hindu was as follows: "My brother's sons, J, T and S, shall receive, for defrayment of the expenses of their pious acts, the following out of the properties left by me, to wit....The said three nephews shall hold possession of the same in equal shares. and shall pay the Government revenue of the same into the Collectorate. They shall have no right to alienate the same by gift or sale; but they, their sons, grandsons, and other descendants in the male line, shall enjoy the same, and shall perform acts of piety as they respectively shall see fit for the spiritual welfare of our ancestors. If any of them die without leaving a male child (which God forbid), then his share shall devolve on the surviving nephews and their male descendants, and not on their other heirs."

Held that, on the true construction of the last sentence in the portion of the will set out above, " any of them" meant any of the three nephews, not any of their descendants; on the death of any of the three nephews his share should go to the surviving nephews or nephew, not to the descendants of a dead nephew; but on the estate getting into the hands of the surviving nephew or nephews, it was to descend, as had been before provided, to males only (59-60).

This construction disposes of an ingenious argument of Mr. Mayne—based on the hypothesis that upon the death of the second nephew—his share would go to his surviving brother, and to the "male descendants" of his dead brother —that this would be a gift to a class, some of whom, i.e., the male descendants, could not take, and would, therefore, by a well-known rule of law, be altogether invalid (60). ———Nephews and their male descendants—Bequest to—Gift over in event of death of any of them without leaving male issue—Estate conveyed by original bequest—Effect of gift over.

The question in the appeals arose upon the construction of a clause in a Hindu will, which was in these terms:—

"My brother's three sons shall receive, for defrayment of the expenses of their pious acts, the following out of the properties left by me, to wit,....The said three nephews shall hold possession of the same in equal shares, and shall pay the Government revenue of the same into the Collectorate. They shall have no right to alienate the same by gift or sale; but they, their sons, grandsons, and other descendants in the male line, shall enjoy the same, and shall perform acts of piety as they respectively shall see fit for the spiritual welfare of our ancestors. If any of them die without leaving a male child (which God forbid), then his share shall devolve on the surviving nephews and their male descendants, and not on their other heirs."

The three nephews of the testator were living at his death; two of them died subsequently, one unmarried, the other leaving a widow but no issue; and the suit out of which the appeals arose was instituted by the surviving nephew of the testator against the infant son of the testator to obtain a declaration that he (the plaintiff) became on the death of his brothers entitled to the entire property bequeathed by the testator to his nephews.

Held, on the authority of the Tagore case, that a life estate only was created in favour of the three nephews (58-9).

Held further that, on the death of the first nephew, his share went to the other two, and that, on the death of the second, the share which he left behind him made up of his original and his accrued share went to the plaintiff, the surviving nephew (59-60). should his widow continue in the family then, whenever whatever brito neom acts, ceremonies proper, that she perform, the expenses for the same she shall receive from my estate; should she be disobedient, and not remain in my house, depart, or live elsewhere; or, should she not wish to continue in the family, then the said widow woman shall receive Rs. 2,000, on my real and personal properties, business, trading business, and properties, etc., she will be unable to make a claim or demand to her husband's suitable share ; and if, in like manner, the son's daughters have sons born, then the said sons, each person, will receive Rs. 200.

Ninth Paragraph:—From amongst my sons, whenever whatsoever shall be the elder, under his direction all the business shall be performed, I hereby appoint the above five sons the Turney of this my will."

After the testator's death his sons, without proving their father's will, lived together in the usual way as a joint Hindoo family, carrying on their father's business.

One of the sons married the plaintiff-respondent, and died soon afterwards intestate, leaving her his sole widow and heiress. He had no son, but left two daughters by a former marriage.

In a suit brought by the respondent for, inter alia, a declaration of her rights under the said will, held—

(1) that the five sons took an absolute estate in the property ;

(2) that the share which each son took, and which would have gone to his heirs according to the Hindoo Law was, in the case of any one of his sons leaving no son, directed to go to the other sons (60).

Their Lordships are of opinion that the effect of this will is to direct that the share which each son took, and which would have gone to his heirs according to the Hindu law, was, in the case of any one of his sons leaving no son, directed to go to the other sons, if not in express words, still by a necessary inference to be drawn from the expressions used by him (60). ———Sons—Gift to two—Death of one without leaving male issue—Gift over in event of, of entire estate to survivor—Death of one after lifetime of testator—Gift over if takes effect in case of.

A Hindu made a will by which after appointing his two sons "executors, heirs and owners" of the whole of his property (which was self-acquired) and directing them to divide and take equal shares in it with certain exceptions gave each of them a half share of his estate not specifically disposed of by the will. By clause 9 he made the following bequest, "I have divided between and given to my two sons the whole of my property as mentioned above. But should either of these two sons die without having had (leaving) any male issue the survivor of the said two sons is duly to take the whole of the property appertaining to the share of the deceased son who may have (leave) no male issue (behind him) after undertaking (to defray) the expenses in connection with the maintenance of his widow and marriage of his minor daughter. But under these circumstances the heirs of my deceased son, S, shall not get any right whatever."

The two sons survived the testator and divided the property between them. The elder son died subsequently without male issue, but leaving him surviving his widow, and a minor daughter.

The High Court held, on the construction of the will, that the period of distribution contemplated by the testator was the period of his death, and that at that time half of the testator's estate became vested in each of his sons absolutely. In other words the High Court held that clause 9 of the will should be read as if the survivorship there provided was limited to survivorship at the death of the testator.

Held, reversing the High Court, that the words of clause 9 were not limited to servivorship during the testator's life, but clearly pointed to survivorship whenever it should occur, and that in the events that happened the surviving son was as such survivor entitled to the estate conveyed by the said clause, subject to the obligation imposed upon him of maintaining his brother's widow and daughter (413-4). The will of a Hindu, after stating that D, the widow of his pre-deceased son, had no other heirs except her two daughters, and after giving a life interest in his properties to D, proceeded as follows: "Furthermore to the said D, too, these very two daughters named above, together with their children, are and shall be heir and malik."

On a question being raised whether the daughters of D, took as joint tenants or tenants in common, the High Court were of opinion that they would take as joint tenants.

Their Lordships found it unnecessary to decide that question (15). (Sir Robert P. Collier.) MAHOMED SHUMSOOL v. SHEWUKRAM.

———Persons who would be testator's heirs at her death or right heirs of testator.

Where the testator directed that 2/3 of his estate should be taken by his brother and that out of the remaining 1/3 certain minor bequests including certain poojah expenses and some monthly allowances were to be paid and that the residue should be used in the purchase of Government paper and that the interest thereof should be paid to his widow for her life and after her death the residue was to be given to such persons as should be testator's heirs.

Held (1) that if the term 'heirs' was taken to mean persons who would be the testator's heirs at the widow's death the gift was void and there was an intestacy as to the residue and the widow would be entitled under the law for a widow's estate; and (2) that if the term "heir" was taken to mean the testator's right heir, and that was the right construction, the right heir would be the widow and the latter would be entitled to the residue for a widow's estate under the will. A devised his property in equal shares to his five sons. Considerable surplus rents of the property so devised were not drawn by the five sons, but were allowed to accumulate and were laid out in the purchase of additional landed property. B, one of the five sons of A, by his will, after leaving all his share of the landed and other interests devised to him by the will of A, to his daughter C, and son D, in equal shares, devised to the said D, "the whole of the villages, landed property, etc., which have been purchased for the estate out of the accumulations of the surplus rents since the late Colonel Skinner's (his father A's) demise, and in which I have a fifth share." Held, that the separate acquisitions were not accretions to the originally devised estate of A, and that they passed absolutely to D alone, to the exclusion of C, under the devise contained in B's will.

It is contended that the new acquisitions must be regarded in law as accretions to the original devised estate, and as passing with them under the gifts made by B's will. But their Lordships find no ground for this conclusion, and they are of opinion that the purchased estate followed the ownership of the purchase money, which was the absolute property of the five sons in equal shares. Will—Issue in.

G, a deceased Hindu, had no male issue, but had two daughters, P aged seven years, and S aged three, born of his fourth wife Sivagangai. By his will, he gave away his estate, which he described, to his said two daughters. Then occured the following sentences in the said will :—

"The aforesaid two daughters after their marriage shall with their husbands remain in this family and enjoy as one family the income of the aforesaid properties without division and without alienating by sale, etc."

"If in so doing there should be disagreement between them the income thereof minus the joint expenses shall be enjoyed by them both in equal shares. If both the said daughters have issue, they shall divide the said properties equally. Those who have no issue shall as aforesaid enjoy the income for their lives and those who have issue shall enjoy the whole property. Till then the miras shall continue in my name. In case your mother and you disagree and live separately, you shall pay 21 Kalams of paddy and Rupees 7 a year for her maintenance.

G further provided that if he should recover and get a male child, the entire property should go to that child, He died, however, a few days afterwards, and there was no male child born. P married and had issue, the appellants, and S also married, and died subsequently. Whether or no she had a child was matter of dispute. She had none living at the time of her death.

The High Court held, on the construction of the will, that on the birth of children to both the daughters the will gave them absolute interests in severalty. It was contended in appeal that the contingency on which the absolute gift was made must be taken to be not the birth of issue, but having issue who survived the parent.

Their Lordships over-ruled the contention and affirmed the High Court (127-8).

There can be no dispute as to the literal meaning of the words "have issue" in any of the three contexts in which they occur. In the first two the testator contemplates the continued existence of those who " have issue, " and in the second it is almost impossible to construe the words as "leave issue." There is absolutely nothing on the face of the will to suggest any secondary meaning (127-1). (Lord Hobhouse.) GURUSAMI PILLAI v. SIVAKAMI AMMAL.

———Death of one without leaving male issue—Gift over to survivor in event of—Income from share of deceased between testator's death and his own—Right of his widow to—Dayabhaga law.

A testator by his will made an absolute gift of his real and personal estate to his five sons (an undivided Hindu family) in equal shares, and in a subsequent part of his will, in the event of any of his five sons dying without a son or son's son, there was a gift over to such of his sons or son's sons as should be alive. After the death of the testator the sons lived together, and no partition of the estate was made, the surplus income and the increment being kept with the common stock. Upon the death of one of the sons without leaving a son or son's son, his widow who was entitled to a life interest in her husband's estate, claimed her husband's share of the accumulation of income and the increment thereon. Held, upon a construction of the will, that in the absence of any direction of the testator that his sons should continue as a joint family, such an intention could not be imported into the will, and that the testator's intention was that his sons should enjoy during their lives the interest of their respective shares of the property ; and therefore, that,

———Death of one without leaving male issue—Gift over to survivor in event of—Income from share of deceased between testator's death and his own—Right of his widow to—Estate taken by her in.

A Hindu testator bequeathed his properties to his five sons who were members of a joint Hindu family, with a provision that, in the event of the death of any of them without leaving male issue at the time of his death, his share was to go over to the surviving sons. It was held that, on the true construction of will, on the death of one of the sons without leaving male issue, the corpus of the share bequeathed to him by the will passed to his surviving brothers and not to his widow. The question was as to who was entitled (1) to the accumulations which arose from that share from the date of the death of the testator to the time of the death of that son and (2) to all such interest and accumulations as, since the death of that son, arose from such one-fifth share of those accumulations, the surviving sons or the widow of the deceased son.

Held (1) that the widow of the deceased son was entitled to a widow's estate in a fifth part of the accumulations which arose from the bequeathed properties from the date of the death of the testator to the time of the death of her husband; (2) that she was absolutely entitled to all such interest and accumulations as, after the death of her husband, arose from the one-fifth part of the accumulations referred to under heading No. 1 (138). generation after generation. The rest of the servants will be paid for life only." At the end of the will there was a detail of expenses, the first of which was:—"Expenses of imambara, assemblies, koran readers, etc., to be continued for ever under the management of D, Rs. 214—7—1." Then there was: "G, my sister, to be paid" Rs. 20 per month; then came the plaintiff in the suit out of which the appeal arose, Rs. 100, and then came the rest of the servants.

Held that the legacies were payable out of the general estate of the testatrix, and that the payment thereof was not limited to the fund of Rs. 1933, the income of the Government promissory notes (122). (Sir Robert P. Collier.) PRINCE SULEMAN KADR v. DARAB ALI KHAN. (1881) 8 I. A. 117 = 8 C. 1 (67) = 4 Sar. 267 = R. & J's. No. 64 (Oudh).

———M was a lady of great wealth. Besides her landed property, she was in the enjoyment of wasika allowance of Rs. 450 a month, a pension of Rs. 4,500 a month which was stopped in 1873, and an income of 12 lakhs of rupees which were settled by treaty, and in which she had only a life-interest. At the time of her death her moveable property was admittedly worth about 9 lakhs and odd, including Government notes worth about 6 lakhs and odd rupees. The lady died in 1881, having executed a will in 1860, clause 5 of which will provided as follows:—

Rs. 981 of the Queen's coin, out of my allowance from wasika and notes, etc., shall be paid monthly from the Government treasury to my relations, dependants and servants as detailed below.....and the remainder of my allowance from wasika and notes, etc., and the whole of my landed property, i.e., houses and groves, etc., and jagir villages, shall be divided among my grandsons and granddaughters, according to their lawful shares and be paid to the agent of each of them.

The provisions of the will showed an intention on the part of the testatrix to dispose of the whole of the property over which the lady had disposing power.

It was argued that, upon the true construction of the will, the annuities provided by clause 5 were directed to be paid solely and exclusively from the pension of the testatrix and that, as she had no power of disposition over it at the time of her death, the legacies failed.

Held that the annuities and stipends were payable out of the testatrix's moveable property, which she had power to dispose of by will (89).

Probably the testatrix was under the erroneous impression that she could deal with the wasika allowance, and her pension from Government, and the income of the fund settled by treaty. But their Lordships are of opinion that the words of the gift are large enough to charge the annuities or stipends in question upon the Government notes held by the testatrix, and also upon the rest of her moveable property (89).

Semble if the words of the will were to be taken in a more restricted sense, the gift of the annuities or stipends must be regarded as a demonstrative legacy, and in that view they would be payable out of the testatrix's general estate, in the event of the failure of the particular fund, pointed out for their payment (89-90). ———Humble request for subsistence—Condition of—If condition precedent—Compliance with condition—What amounts to.

S, the then Zemindar of Kuruppam, executed a will which, after referring to a suit then pending between him and B, his brother, and N, the son of another brother deceased, and to the attempts of B, & N, to oust him (S), from the sole and undivided possession of the Zemindari, provided as follows:—

"Under these circumstances, should this suit be disposed of against B, & N, and should they after the final court's decision humbly apply for subsistence, they should be given either from my self-acquired lands or jerayati lands fetching cist at Rs. 500, five hundred rupees per head per year from that time. Separate lands should be purchased for the amount, which is twenty times the said amount, and given. It is arranged that cash payments should continue to be paid until they are available, and that those landed properties should be enjoyed as long as there are male heirs and then revert to the Zemin. If it should take place during the minority of my son, the managers and then my son should give effect to this."

Apart from bequest, neither B, nor the respondent, his son, nor N, had any legal claim for maintenance against S, or the appellant, his son and the succeeding Zemindar. It was so decided finally in the suit referred to in the will. The will itself referred to that fact and stated that the provision for maintenance made thereby was made out of mercy.

Held, that the defeated litigants humbly applying for subsistence was a condition precedent to their obtaining the maintenance bequeathed by the will (109).

The theory of the testator is (what the courts ultimately held) that the legal pretensions of the brother and nephew were unjust, and that anything that the testator would do for them was of mere grace. The bequest is made contingent on two events, (1) the court's decision being in favour of the testator, and (2) the defeated litigant's humbly applying for subsistence. The latter of these conditions cannot be said to be exacting or arrogant, or inappropriate to the situation. At the least, the words mean that the bequest is to go only to people who acknowledge that they have nothing to appeal to but the liberality of their successful adversary (108-9).

Held further, that exhibits C, & D, were not "humble request" for subsistence within the meaning of the will. C, was addressed to the Collector of the District, and not to S, who was then dead. It reasserted the Zemindar's duty to maintain the applicant (B); and the abstention from further appealing was ascribed to prudential reason. Finally, the application was not for what was given in the will, but for twelve times as much. Exhibit D, was written neither by B, or N, but by a son of B. It is, moreover, in substance a protest against the inadequacy of the bequest, and a demand for something "suitable to our dignity" (111). Will—Manager under.

———Commission of 10 per cent. from income—Provision for—Gross income or net income divisible among co-sharers.

The will of a testator, by which he bequeathed the income of his estates to his five sons to share alike, provided. "One of my sons, whichever is most fit or whoever I may name hereafter, is to manage the whole concern, for which trouble he is to get 10 per cent. from the whole income; and he is bound to shew a faithful account current yearly to his brothers".

The question arose whether the 10 per cent. commission to which the manager was entitled was to be calculated upon the gross collections, or upon the net income of the estate, being the fund which, subject to that commission, was divisible amongst the co-sharers.

Held, that the only way to make the whole will consistent was to hold that the commission was to be calculated upon the net fund divisible amongst the five sharers (208).

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Will—Manager under—(Contd.)

The word "income", as used in the clause of the will bequeathing the same, obviously means the divisible fund. It was a fund to arise from the net returns from the different estates, on some of which were indigo factories, which were in the nature of trading concerns. An increased profit on one estate might be met by a loss on another; but the profits and losses were all to enter into one account, the balance of which was to constitute the divisible income or fund (207).

There are no grounds for construing the word "income" in the portion of the clause of the will relating to the manager in a sense different from that in which it is used in the prior clause; and there is nothing to support the contention that the manager was entitled to charge commission upon each sum which came to his hands from each separate estate or source of income; still less to charge it upon the nominal rents payable by the tenants or cultivators, irrespective of the costs of collection (207-8). ———Repair of house bequeathed to himself and other sharers—Charges of—Manager's right to—Occupation rent of house—His liability for.

By his will a testator bequeathed the income of all his estates to his five sons, to share alike. One of his sons, whichever was most fit or whoever the testator might name thereafter, was to manage the whole concern, rendering a faithful account yearly to his brothers. In respect of one of the properties viz., a house at Delhi, the will provided: "should my personal property not pay off all my debts, they" (the sons) "may sell my house at Delhi; but should the personal property pay the debt, the house to be rented, and the rent, after paying for the yearly repairs, to be divided amongst my five sons."

Up to the time of the mutiny the house was neither sold nor let, but. by the common consent of the co-sharers, was kept up more or less for their common benefit as a mansion at Delhi. After the mutiny, during which it had been looted and greatly injured, the estate received from the Government, by way of compensation in respect of it, a sum of Rs. 18,000. That sum the sons agreed, not to lay out upon the house, but to divide as part of the profits of the estate. The house was then put into some sort of tenantable repair, and was let for several years. Then the defendant, one of the surviving sons of the testator and the manager under the terms of the will, put an end to the lease, and laid out a very considerable sum of money upon the house in repairs, alterations and furnishing; and from that time he occupied it, whenever he was at Delhi, more as his own residence than as anything common to the family at large.

In a suit instituted by the sons of one of the deceased sons of the testator against the defendant for an account of his management of the joint estate and for payment to plaintiffs of their share of the rents and profits, the question arose whether the defendant was entitled to credit for the entire amount expended by him in repairing, altering, and furnishing the house at Delhi and whether he ought to be charged with an occupation rent of the house, for the period it was occupied by him exclusively, as if it had been let to him.

Held that the defendant was entitled to credit only for the amount expended by him upon necessary repairs of the house, that he was entitled to credit only for the expenses of the establishment which would necessarily be kept up in the house to protect and preserve it whilst unlet, and that he was liable to be charged with an occupation rent of the house (209).

Held, reversing the High Court, that the document was not a will (307-8).

If the form of the document only is considered no doubt it might be regarded as a will, but, having regard to the fact that it was executed by a person who was a minor and incapable of making a will, their Lordships are unable to agree with the decision of the High Court. The so-called will is not a "legal declaration of the intentions of the testator", for it had no legal effect and was not capable of disposing of any of the estates of the deceased. So far as it purported to deal with his property it was a nullity (308). (Lord Salvesen.) KONDAPALLI VIJAYARATNAM v. MANDAPAKA SUDARSANA RAO. (1925) 52 I.A. 305 = 48 M. 614 = 23 A. L. The mere simultaneity of two wills made by a husband and a wife and the similarity of their terms do not of necessity imply an agreement on the part of either not to revoke or modify them without the assent of the other. F, a Hindu, executed a deed, in the nature of a testamentary instrument, the material part of which was in the following terms :—

"After my decease, of the half-share of the mercantile establishments, belonging to me of right, my widow (M) shall be the mistress and disposer. If, during the lifetime of my widow, my brother, Beekharry aforesaid, or my nephews, to wit, Koonj Behary, and Mudun Mohun, and Goonee Lal, and Dial Das, shall lay any claim to the half-share of the mercantile establishments, mine by right, it shall be held false ; my widow is the mistress and disposer of the half-share belonging to me, the declarant . . . . After the decease of my said widow, whatsoever may remain of the property under her control, let it be disposed of as follows, to wit, Rs. 20,000 let the wife of Beekharry, my brother, take. In the event of her not surviving till then, let the sons of my said brother take the same. Rs. 20,000 for the expenses of 'sadaburt', shall be deposited in some creditable house of business. After the above-mentioned two items, whatever of houses, orchards, go-downs, cash, woollen and other goods, may remain after the use of my said widow, let my brother, Beekharry aforesaid, and, after the death of my said brother, his sons, take one half, and let Goonee Lal and Dial Das, who are the sons of Bhowanny, my deceased brother, take the remaining half."

Beekharry died during the lifetime of the widow, M.

Held that, on the right construction of the will, on the death of Beekharry the property given to him by the will became divisible into two parts, one moiety to his sons, and they took the same as tenants in common-in fact, they had each of them a vested interest in one-fourth share not to come into actual enjoyment till the death of the widow (173-4, 177). The will of a Hindu testator, after providing for the devolution of his estate on his children and their descendants, stated that, in the event of no children of his or their descendants being born or being alive at the time of his death, his nephew, Lalit Mohun, should, on his death, become his stalabhishikta and should, becoming owner (malik) of all his estate and properties and obtaining the management of all his affairs, residing in his (testator's) ancestral abode and keeping the estate in tact, enjoy with son, grandson, and so on in succession, the proceeds of his estate. The will further stated that, in the event of the nephew dying sonless, his wife should receive a monthly allowance as long as she lived ; and that, in the event of his leaving female offspring, that daughter or those daughters should receive expenses and marriage expenses from his estate. In the absence of the said nephew's son, grandson, great-grandson and so on, the will provided that other nephews of the testator should take the estate. Held that Lalit Mohun took an absolute and heritable estate under the will.

Their Lordships repelled the two contentions against this conclusion :—(1) that there was a general intention expressed in the will to give only a succession of life estates to Lalit Mohun and his male issue without power of alienation; and (2) that the will contained such a sufficiently expressed intention to exclude females from the succession as would cut down the words of inheritance to heirs male and give Lalit Mohun only an estate to him and his heirs male which would be void beyond the life estate according to the well-settled principle of Hindu law. Held, on the construction of the will, that the nephews were intended to take a vested and transmissible interest on the death of the testator, though their possession and enjoyment were postponed (63).

Will—Nephew's widow—Bequest to.

———Estate conveyed—Life estate not absolute estate.

A Hindu testator directed that after the death of his widow and son's widow, Brij Nath Kuar, widow of the testator's nephew, Raghuraj Singh, "will remain in possession and occupation of the entire property mentioned above," and then expressed that he executed his will in favour of Brij Nath Kuar "so that on my demise and the death of my wife the estate and name of my ancestors may continue to exist as they have been in past and in present, that she in place of Raghuraj Singh shall perform my funeral ceremonies and those of my wife . . . and then she shall have the power to nominate any one whom she thinks fit as heir so that the good name of the family and its reputation may continue to exist as it has been in past and in present."

Held, that on the true construction of the will, Brij Nath Kuar took not an absolute estate but only an estate for life.

Will—Oudh Talukdar—(Contd.)

A was a Mahomedan gentleman who married two wives and had children by both of them. His will executed in 1873 took notice that a daughter had just been born to him by his second wife, and then proceeded :—

"I do execute this will, in modification of my will dated 19-9-1870, and got the same duly registered, so that after my demise the engagement in respect of the ilaka (estate) in its entirety and without division may be made in the name of Muhammad Saeed Khan, and that Sultan, and Mussumat Moti Bibi, and Mussumat Shaban Bibi may be as equal sharers (with him) entitled to appropriate profits, and that the profits of the said estate after deducting therefrom the Government revenue, talookdari, and Ahl-i-biradri (members of brotherhood) expenses may be divided equally among the four persons. Let no one act contrary to this. Should any one do so, his act shall be null and void both before the authorities for the time being and the members of the brotherhood. If in case Muhammad Saeed Khan fail to distribute the profits, or raise a dispute over the distribution, each sharer shall be competent to have with the help of the Government set apart for him lands yielding his share of profits ; but the estate shall coutinue in the name of Muhammad Saeed Khan entire and undivided.

Held, on the construction of the will, that Sultan Khan took a heritable interest under it in his grandfather's talookdari estate (83).

In order to shew that an unlimited gift of profits is less than a gift of the corpus, some evidence should be found in the context or in the circumstances affecting the property. The context, so far from favouring the restriction of the gift, bears the other way. The testator does not give the estate to Saeed, but directs that the engagement shall be made in his name. When he disposes of the surplus, after deducting revenue and expenses, he puts all four takers on the same footing—equal shares of profits are given to each. Finally comes the provision that in case of dispute each sharer shall have land set apart for him, only the estate is to continue in the name of Saeed (clearly as lumbardar) entire and undivided. By a will made in 1907, an Oudh taluqdar devised to his nephew all the moveable and immoveable properties owned and possessed by him at the time of his death, or to which he had a right of ownership, or possession of any kind, or to which he might acquire a right in future. The will provided that the appellant, the widow of the testator. should get Rs. 500 per mensem from the estate in cash, besides the ' Sir ' lands in her possession ; that she should be the owner, and take possession of all his personal goods, such as clothes, ornaments, etc. Before his death, the testator gave the appellant cultivated lands in eight villages and an entire village for her maintenance and put her in possession. In 1911 he petitioned the Revenue Authorities to enter the suit village in the name of his wife as "muafi" or rent-free land and the entry was accordingly made. At the first regular settlement the village had been entered as " Sir " in the possession of the wife of the then taluqdar for her maintenance, but owing to a change in the view of the revenue authorities as to what constituted " Sir ", it had afterwards been entered as " muafi." The testator died in 1912, and his uephew, the respondent, succeeded to the estate under his will.

In a suit brought by the respondent against the appellant to have the suit village assessed to rent under the Oudh Rent Act (XXII of 1886), S. 107-G, held that the words " Sirat-i-maqbuza " in the will did apply to and cover not only sir-lands which might be accurately described as "Sir," but also the suit village, and that the testator, in confirmation of his gift of 1911 to his wife of the suit village rent-free for her life, did by his will intend to bequeath, and did bequeath, to her the suit village for her life as a proprietor, and without any liability to have it assessed to rent.

Held further that the respondent, who took his interest in the taluqa under that will, and whose only title to any part of the taluqa was under that will, could not repudiate the condition of the will that the suit village should be held by the appellant for her life rent-free. Will—Perpetuity—Intention to create.

———Limiting for indefinite period of enjoyment of profits of estate—No gift of estate—Validity of bequest in case of.

The material part of the will of a Hindu ran as follows:—" My estate shall remain intact, and from the profits thereof there shall be performed the worship, the periodical festivals and ceremonies, of my ancestral deities, idols and chakras according to my turn, as they have hitherto been performed. As regards the enjoyment of the profits, I do hereby provide that my houses, zemindaries, talooks, and other immovable properties, and my business of various descriptions, and the capital stock thereof, shall always remain intact as at present, and my heirs, sons, sons' sons, and great grandsons, and so on in succession, shall be entitled to enjoy the profits thereof. No one shall be competent to alienate by sale or gift the immoveable property, to close any business, to misappropriate the capital stock thereof, or to divide the same. If any one succeeds in doing so, or will do so, it shall be disallowed by the authorities."

HINDU LAW--(Contd.)

Will—Perpetuity—Intention to create—(Contd.)

Held, on a construction of the whole will, that the object of the testator was to create a perpetuity as regards the estate, and to limit, for an indefinite period, the enjoyment of the profits of it, which would not be allowed by Hindu law, and that there was no gift of the estate (109).

The testator says distinctly, " my estate shall remain intact," and then he proceeds to say, as regards the enjoyment of the property, the estate remaining intact, my heirs, sons, etc., " Shall be entitled to enjoy the profits thereof". These words appear to indicate that he was not going to give away the estate, but that all he intended was to give the enjoyment of the profits to the persons mentioned in the will. The case is not one where the bequest is of rents and profits, and it appears that it was the intention of the testator to pass the estate. In such a case, no doubt, those words would be sufficient to do it. Looking at the whole of the provisions of the will, their Lordships gather from those words that it was not his intention to pass the estate. The provision afterwards against alienation further confirms this (109-110).

The subsequent clauses of the will confirm this view of his intention. Having said that the profits are to be enjoyed, he, in the subsequent paragraphs, provides for what he considers and intends to be the mode of the enjoyment ; and it is very material to notice that in the 8th paragraph he assigns a 6 annas portion for the family worship of the idols, and also for the maintenance of the family whilst they continue joint, leaving a 10 annas share which, as long as the family remained joint, would not be, as he supposed, expended at all. What he does with that is to provide that it shall simply accumulate. He does not dispose of it in any way, but as long as the family remains joint it accumulates ; again confirming the view that his intention was that the estate itself should not be disposed of (110).

Then he goes on to provide for the way in which the profits shall be enjoyed in the event of disagreement among the members of the family and their separating ; but the whole of these provisions appear to their Lordships to be consistent with and to support the view that the intention was that the estate itself should not be disposed of, and that there was no gift of the estate, but simply a gift with reference to the enjoyment of the profits (110). funeral expenses, debts, and ordinary legacies within a year after his death, and to convert the rest into money and securities, and invest the proceeds in the name of the trustees, with power to change the securities.

To pay annuities afterwards given (except Rs. 1,000 a-month afterwards given for worship) and legacies payable after the investment ; and : " After payment of such annuities and legacies do and shall pay the surplus unexpended of the said interest, dividends, and annual proceeds unto the person or persons who for the time being shall under the limitations and directions hereinafter contained and expressed, be entitled to the beneficial enjoyment of my real property, or of the rents and profits or surplus rents and profits thereof ; and so soon as all of the said annuities and legacies shall have fallen in and been fully paid and satisfied, do and shall stand possessed of and interested in the said trust moneys and securities, and the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof, in trust absolutely for the person or persons entitled under the limitations and directions hereinafter contained and expressed, to the beneficial or absolute enjoyment of my said real property."

The question was how far the personalty not settled with the realty but to be made into a distinct fund by the will after the legacies and annuities had been disposed of, ought to be dealt with ; whether the bequest of the corpus was void, or whether the interest was to be enjoyed by the tenant for life so long as he could enjoy the realty.

Held, on the right construction of the will, that after the legacies and annuities fell in and were satisfied. the intention was to establish a trust of a fund, consisting of money and securities, the interest of which should be paid to the person or persons for the tlme being successively entitled to the rents of the real estate, the corpus remaining otherwise undisposed of (80-2). Will—Power of appointment of heir— Gift with—Validity of power.

———Limits of—English rules—Applicability.

Where by the will of a Hindu the whole of his immoveable estate was given on certain trusts, which were to stand valid during the lifetime of his daughter and her children but were to become void if there were no children subject to the condition that in the former case the estate was to be divisible amongst the heirs of the children on the expiration of the trusts while in the latter it was "to be delivered to such persons as my daughter may direct it to be delivered by making her will," held that, in the contingency of the daughter having no children, the gift of the absolute estate was not to her but only to such persons as she should appoint by will ; that such power of appointment was not contrary to any principle of Hindu Law ; and that the appointment would be valid if made in favour of persons who were actually or in contemplation of law in existence at the death of the testator.

The result of the decisions is that according to settled law, if the testator here had himself designated the person who was to take the property in the event of his daughter dying childless, the bequest would be good. The remaining question is, whether his substituting his daughter and giving her power to designate the person by her will is contrary to any principle of Hindu law. The reasons which have led to a testamentary power becoming part of the Hindu law are applicable to this power, and it is the duty of the court ———Shebaitship of—Absolute gift of, to a person on his attaining his majority—What amounts to.

A Hindu, after declaring by his will the properties to be debutter for the maintenance of the family idol, stated in it that "my present begotten son" (appellant's father) should be shebait for performance of the ceremonies. The testator then made provision for his own death during the minority of his son, in which case his widow was to be the shebait as his son's guardian, and continued that his son on attaining majority should personally conduct the work of the sheba. In the event of the death of his son during the testator's lifetime or after his death, the will provided that the testator's widow should be the shebait, and that after her his daughters by her (the respondents) should be shebaits.

Held that, on the true construction of the will, there was an absolute gift of the shebaitship to the appellant's father on his attaining his majority, and it was not cut down by anything that followed.

There were provisions in case of his death as a minor, but no cutting down of the absolute gift to him. (Lord Macnaghten). TRIPURARI PAL v. JAGAT TARINI DASI.

N, a Hindu governed by the Dayabhaga school of Hindu law, made a will in English, which dealt with the suit property in the following words :—

"I give and bequeath Company's Rs. 20,000 for the religious worship at my house, a lower-roomed house in which the pagoda is established, and another house situated to the north of the pagoda consisting of about five cottahs of ground two upper rooms and two lower rooms, and also a flower garden situated to the east of the pagoda and two lower brick-built sheds." And then later on in the will the testator directed as follows:—"The superintendence of the pagoda I entrust to my wife, and after her death to hold it by my son G, after his death by my daughter and her husband Nundo Doolal Bose, and their male children successively."

N, when he died, left (1) his widow, (2) G, his son, (3) K, his daughter married to Nundo Doolal Bose, (4) Sham Chand Bose, and two others, grandsons, sons of K, (5) P, grandson by a predeceased son of N, and (6) M, grandson, adopted son of G. The shebaitship was assumed in turn by (1) the widow of N, (2) G, his son, and (3) Shama Chand Bose, whose father Nundo Doolal Bose and his mother K had died before G. Shama Chand survived his two brothers, and died. On his death his son and his nephew took possession of the trust estate. Thereupon the plaintiff a great-grandson and the eldest heir in the male line of N, brought the suit out of which the appeal arose claiming to be entitled as the heir of the founder of the endowment to the shebaitship thereof. His case was that the line of shebaits appointed by the testator failed on the death of Sham Chand Bose. The contention of the defendants, the son of Shama Chand and his nephew, was that the intention of the testator was to confer a perpetual shebaitship upon his daughter or her husband, or their male children, and that therefore they were entitled to the shebaitship and not the plaintiff.

The High Court held that, on the true construction of the will, the daughter, her husband and their male children were intended to take the shebaitship one after another for their respective lives, and in that sons "successively"; and that the words "male children" must be read as words of purchase and not of limitation.

Will—Residence.

———Condition of—Boitakanah house of testator—Residence in — Condition as to — Compliance with—What amounts to.

The will of a Hindu testator contained a clause for the cesser and determination of the life interest of the respondent in case he ceased to use as his residence the testator's Boitakanah house.

The question for decision was whether the respondent had done acts which, having regard to the nature of a Boitakanah house and to HIndu usages, would amount to the use of it as a residence.

It appeared that the respondent, who adhered more strictly than the testator to Hindu usages, had continued to take his meals and sleep in the family house, where the other members of his family lived; but that after the respondent entered upon possession the Boitakanah house had been constantly kept open, new furniture had been added to the old, the library taken care of, and not only durwans but menial servants had lived in the house. The respondent himself frequently, if not daily, went to the house, and usually spent several hours there. It appeared, also, that he transacted all affairs of business there, and on some occasions received visitors in rooms properly furnished for their reception.

Held that those acts did, having regard to the nature of a Boitakanah house and to Hindu usages, amount to the use of it as a residence (399-40).

With regard to entertainments given by the respondents, held that he was not obliged to give them in the Boitakanah house, although, in case he thought fit to do so, he would best comply with the testator's will by using the Boitakanah house on some, at least, of those occasions (400). ———Condition of—Boitakanah house of testator—Residence in—Condition as to—Effect of—Compliance with—Use as dwelling-house if necessary for.

The questions in the appeal arose upon a clause in the will of a Hindu, making provision for the cesser of the estate of the persons entitled under the limitations of the will in the event of non-residence in his Boitskanah house

The clause in question was as follows:—"Provided always, and I hereby declare that if any devisee or tenant for life, or entail, or otherwise, or any person entitled to take as heir by descent, or adoption, or otherwise, or in any manner under the limitations hereinbefore contained, shall permit or suffer the said property so devised and limited, as aforesaid, or any portion thereof, to be sold for arrears of Government revenue, or shall, after attaining his majority, cease to keep up in a due state of repair, and to use as his residence in Calcutta, the said Boitkanah houses and premises where I now reside, and make use and enjoy my library, horses, carriages, farm-yard, furniture in the said house, and jewels, gold and silver plates, etc., in my use and possession, then and immediately thereupon the devise and limitations in this my will contained and declared shall wholly cease and determine as to him, and the person next in succession to him under the limitations aforesaid shall at once succeed as if the said person so permitting or suffering the said property, or any portion thereof, to be sold for arrears of Government revenue, or so ceasing to keep up in a state of repairs, and to use as his residence my said Boitakanah house had then died."

The opinion of the High Court on the nature of the residence imposed by the condition was thus expressed:—

"We think it is to be gathered from the will that the testator never intended the Boitakanah to be occupied as a dwelling-honse in the ordinary sense of a Hindu dwelling-house. We are of opinion that the residence intended by him was an occupation for the purposes of transacting business and of receiving male friends and visitors, and if the occupant of the house for the time being so desired (but not otherwise), for entertaining male friends with hospitality; and we are further of opinion that such an occupation does not require that either the occupant or the ladies of his family should sleep in the house."

Held that, in the main, the High Court had properly construed the clause (396 7). (Sir Montague E. Smith). GANENDRO MOHUN TAGORE v. RAJAH JUTTENDRO MOHUN TAGORE. (1874) 1 I.A. 387=14 B.L.R. 60=22 W.R. 377=3 Sar. 395=3 Suth. 47.

———Condition of—Bequest subject to, generally—Validity of condition—Fulfilment of condition—What amounts to.

Several English decisions were cited as to the meaning of the word "residence." The principle, if any can be said to result from them, seems to be that, where in a condition of residence, no manner or period of residence is prescribed, but residence simply and without definition, exclusive residence is not supposed to be meant; and that in such cases the occasional use of the house, and keeping an establishment in it, with the intention of again using it as residence, is a sufficient compliance with the condition. In one case Lord Eldon seemed to think a condition imposing residence generally, was so vague that it was doubtful whether it could be enforced; and he held that, at all events, slight and rare instances of actual residence by the donee were, when the house was kept open by servants living in it, sufficient to satisfy so general a dlrection. In a case. Rex v. Sargent, where residence was a necessary qualification for the office of bailiff of a borough, Lord Kenyon said :—"It never can be contended that in order to constitute a residence in any place, it is necessary to reside any given number of days, or even any great part of the year. It happens perpetually that persons have different places of abode, in some of which they reside more or less as suits their convenience" (397). (*Sir Montague E. ———Condition of—Compliance with—Reasonable time to be allowed for—Breach of condition—Delay in commencing to reside when not a.

In a case in which the will of a Hindu testator contained a clause for the cesser and determination of the life interest of the respondent in case he ceased to use as his residence the testator's Boitakanah house, held that a reasonable time must be allowed to the donee after the testator's death for the commencement of the residence, before it could be imputed to him that he had ceased to reside (397).

In this case the testator died on 28-8-1868, and the respondent did not use the Boitakanah in any sense as a residence, until some large repairs were completed in October, 1872. During that interval of time he visited the house, and transacted the business there as one of the trustees, and durwans paid by the trustees were kept in it. The delay in his using the house as a residence was found to be due to (1) the house being in need of repairs, (2) the pendency of a litigation in which the title of the respondent to, and his right to possession of, the house were questioned, and (3) the respondent's inability to get possession of the entire house from the trustees.

Held, affirming the High Court, that there had been no unreasonable delay on the part of the respondent in commencing to reside, and that no breach of the condition had then occurred (397-9). By his will a Parsi testator, after declaring certain charitable trusts of a house in Bombay, disposed by cl. 9 of other houses in Bombay described as the Mahalaxmi Bungalow and 56, Honjee Street, along with certain furniture and other effects:—

"Upon trust to permit my daughter during her life and until her death or marriage whichever event shall first happen, and also all my sons and also their respective families during as well as after the respective lifetime of such respective sons, including the widows of my male lineal descendants, to occupy the said premises and make use of the said furniture and effects free of rent during their respective lifetime and until the youngest of my grandsons living at the death of the last survivor of my sons shall attain the age of 18 years and from and after such youngest of my grandsons as aforesaid shall attain the age of 18 years to sell, realise and convert the same into money and divide the sale proceeds after deducting all expenses among such persons as shall be entitled to the proceeds of my other Bombay properties under the directions in that behalf contained in cls. 11, 12 and 13 hereof, provided always and I hereby direct that the right of residence hereby granted to every member of the family as aforesaid is strictly personal and will entitle such member personally to right of residence and use of the furniture and effects but that such rights shall not entitle any member entitled thereto to transfer or alienate the same."

There then followed provisos that on any attempted alienation or transfer the right should cease, and also provisions directing that in case of any son marrying a daughter or son's daughter of a certain person or ceasing to profess the Zoroastrian faith or marrying a person who did not profess that faith or was not born of Parsi parents professing that faith, "then and in any such case the trust in favour of such person and his family for the right of residence and use of furniture herein certained shall forthwith cease and determine and become void."

By cl. 10 the immoveable properties in Bombay, including the bungalow and the Homjee street houses, subject to the trusts affecting them already mentioned, were devised on trust to expend the net income for the maintenance and upkeep of all such of the testator's children and their respective families entititled to the right of residence under cl. 9 as should reside in the premises there reserved for their residence, until the expiration of ten years from his death or until the death of his last surviving son, whichever should first happen.

The question for decision was whether the rights of residence and maintenance under the said clauses of the will extended to any one excepting the sons and daughter of the testator.

Held that, on the true construction of the words, the little conferred on the sons of the testator to occupy extended to occupation along with their wives and families.

Semble the daughter of the testator could not properly claim a right to bring in husband and family if she had them.

Held further that the same principles applied as to the persons entitled to the maintenance allowance provided by cl. 10.

Quære as to the title to reside of the widows or families of deceased persons. Ss. 99, 100 and 101 of the Succession Act may give rise to difficulty in the claim of a widow and family who have survived a son. It is not clear that the whole of the testator's interest in the thing bequeathed was comprised in the bequest in such a case in their favour. Will—Residuary bequest.

———Bequest amounting to a—"If anything remains."

A testator made specific gifts of portions of his real estate and then a complete residuary devise of the balance in favour of one of his sons. He also gave certain legacies and allowances to named legatees; he provided for the disposition of moveable property, such as houses, carriages, and furniture, and he then continued in cl. 12 in these words. "Out of the Government promissory notes and cash left by me, the cost of taking out probate shall be paid" and certain sum of rupees "shall be spent for the performance of Sradh and the following legacies shall be paid." After specifying such legacies, the clause continued in these words: "If anything remains after meeting the above-mentioned expenses and paying the legacies and debts (if any), the same shall be equally divided between my said two sons, S, & R." Finally in clause 14, the testator provided in special terms for the payment of the costs of probate and his debts in this way, that if the cash and promissory notes were exhausted before his death, or if he left behind him debts which were in excess of the cash and promissory notes, the costs of taking out the probate, the expenses of the sradh and the legacies were to be paid in equal shares by his two sons who were named as the ultimate legatees of the residue of the cash and promissory notes and were to be a charge on the properties which had been specifically given to them. He limited a debt contracted for the acquisition of property in such a manner as to charge it only on that property, but if it was impossible to recover it, or if, by any other means, a debt remained unpaid, he expressly provided that that debt was to be paid by the two sons, S. & R.

Held, that the final words "if anything remains" in cl. 12 of the will were, in truth, in the circumstances of the will, a valid and effectual residuary gift (1031).

"If anything remains after meeting the expenses and paying the legacies and debts (if any)" means that if any balance remains after the legacies and the debts have been paid out of the moneys and out of the properties, which, in due course of administration, are liable for their payment, that balance is to go to the two sons, S, & R, (1031). ———Daughter for life, and, after her death, to brothers and their heirs male respectively in equal shares, and on failure thereof to the sons of the daughter—Bequest to—Construction and effect.

A Hindu testator disposed of the residue of his estate in the following terms:—

"I give devise and bequeath the residue of my real and personal estate both joint and self-acquired unto my executors, in trust to pay the rents issues profits and income thereof unto my said daughter during her lifetime, and after her death in trust to pay, assign and convey the residue of my estate real and personal to my half-brothers Nrependro and Norendro in equal moieties and to the heir or heirs male of their or either of their body, in failure of which in trust to give the same to the son or sons of my said daughter."

The will was dated the 25th of March, 1851. The testator died in 1852. His daughter, who was his only child, was the plaintiff and appellant in the suit out of which the appeal arose. She had 6 sons, all born after the testator's death. His brothers both surrived him. One of them, Nrependro, had died, leaving only two sons, both born after the testator's death. The other, Norendro, was living. He had three sons born in the lifetime of the testator, of whom one was dead and two were living, and four other sons born after the testator's death. The defendants and respondents in the suit were Norendro, his six surviving sons, and the representative of the one who had died; the two sons of Nrependro, who were also his executors; and the six sons of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff contended that the residuary gift was invalid, except so far as it conferred life interests on herself and her uncles, and that on the death of Nrependro the moiety of the estate designed for him or his heirs male became vested in her as her father's sole heir. The adverse contention was that the gift was made absolute to each of the testator's brothers, defeasible only in events which had not happened, viz., in each case, the death of the brother without leaving male heirs of his body them living.

The High Court adopted the latter view of the case, and dismissed the suit. They considered that the true intention of the testator was, "that in the event of his two half-brothers having at the time of their death male descendants, they, if alive, or their families as representing them if dead, should take the fee of his property; but that in the event of their having no such descendants at the time of their death, the estate should be divested and go over to the son or sons of his daughter."

Held, varying the decree below, that, according to the true construction of the will, the gift of the residue, so far as it purported to confer an estate of inheritance on the testator's half-brothers and the heirs male of their bodies, was contrary to law and was void; that in the events which had happened the gift to the sons of the plaintiff, the testator's daughter, was incapable of taking effect; that each of the testator's half-brothers took an estate for his life in one moiety of the residue in remainder expectant on the death of the plaintiff; and that, on the death of Nrependro, the inheritance of his moiety devolved on the plaintiff as her father's heir in remainder immediately expectant on her own life estate under the will, and she therefore became entitled in possession to one moiety of the residue (42-3). ———Operation of—Failure of portion of gift—Falling of that portion into residue for charitable purposes.

A will stated (among other things) the testator's intention to creat a mundir and suitable buildings for the residence of members of his family and for the reception of poor and homeless persons at Brindabun. By clause 17 of the will, the testator directed that out of the income of his estate "a sum of Rs. 650 be remitted monthly and every month by my executors or trustees to the managers for the time being of the mundir of Brindabun to be erected as aforesaid, out of which sum Rs. 100 shall be paid to" certain persons in succession; and then the clause continued, "and the residue or surplus shall be appropriated towards the expenses of performing pujas at or otherwise maintaining the said mundir and of the daily feeding of the poor there". Clause 23 directed that "after paying the monthly sums and the monthly expenses hereinbefore directed to be paid or incurred and also after providing for the payment of taxes, Government revenue and assessments and repairs of my immoveable property, the surplus of the rents, income and profits of property and estate shall be monthly and every month remitted to Brindabun and applied in manner respecting the said monthly sum of Rs. 650, or so much thereof as is not required for the support of my family there, towards the performance of pujas and other religious ceremonies, and for the daily feeding of the poor at my mundir there".

Held, on a construction of the will, that, assuming that the trusts of the sum of Rs. 100 per month, which had failed, did not fall into that particular residue of which the trusts were declared by cl. 17 of the will, the Rs. 100 a month fell into the general residue which was disposed of by cl. 23.

Cl. 23 is a general residuary clause, sweeping up all that is not disposed of by the previous clauses; and, accordingly, by virtue of the ordinary rule, the monthly sum of Rs. 100 fell into the residue of which trusts are declared by cl. 23.

Held further that clause 23 in substance directed that the residue should be applied for the religious and charitable purposes referred to in cl. 17, being the purposes applicable under that clause to the residue of the Rs. 650 per month after deducting the Rs. 100 per month, and that the result was that no sum was left undisposed of by the will. ———Basis of—Illustrations of.

The doctrine of dependent relative revocation is really a question of intention. If by his will a testator gives property to A, and by a codicil gives the same property to B, and if in the event it turns out that B cannot take, it has to be ascertained from the language of the testator as found in his testamentary documents whether he intended that the gift to A should be displaced altogether or that it should be displaced only in favour of B and (if B cannot take) the gift to A should remain. If, as in Tupper v. Tupper, the testator's language is that (1) he revokes the gift to A and (2) in lieu thereof he gives to B, it may well be that there is a revocation for all purposes. If, as in Quinn v. Butler, the donee of a power to charge does by his will charge with £4,000 to be paid to A, and £3,000 to be paid to B, C, and D equally, and then by codicil revokes the aggregate charge of £7,000 made by his will and charges with £7,000 for A, the charge in the will is no doubt gone for all purposes. If, as in Baker v. Story, A takes absolutely under the will, but under the codicil takes for life only with a gift over which fails, and there is an ultimate effectual residuary gift, it is difficult to find any room for a contention that the gift by will is not gone altogether. Alexander v. Kirkpatrick lays down the principle that an alternative inconsistent disposition which is not valid or effectual in itself does not revoke an earlier disposition of the same property (24 5). ———Dispositions of property inconsistent—Wills, earlier and later, making—Revocation of former by latter—Inference of—Propriety—Later will invalid and inoperative.

A Hindu, who was the sole surviving member of a Hindu family, made a will disposing of ancestral family property in a certain way. He then adopted a boy, and, though, by reason of such adoption, he became incompetent to dispose of the ancestral property by a will, he executed another will by which he disposed of the property disposed of by the earlier will in an entirely different way from that in which he had disposed of it by the earlier will. It was contended that, though the testator could not give his properties as he purported to do by his second will, yet from the fact that he purported so to give them there ought to be inferred an intention that, if he could not give them as he purported to do by his second will, his disposition by the earlier will should nevertheless be revoked.

Held, that the dispositions of property by the earlier will were not revoked by the dispositions attempted to be made by the later will (25).

———Destruction actual or revocation formal unnecessary.

V, a Hindu, made a will in 1866, when he was ill; it was put into an envelope and was deposited and registered in the office of the district registrar, where it remained until he died in 1869. V, however, recovered from his illness, and in 1867 he executed a power of attorney appointing a vakil to obtain the will out of the registry and to restore it to him. Owing to some blunder this was not done. V's intention to get his will back into his own possession, and not to leave it as it was, could not be doubted. There was some evidence to shew that he believed he had destroyed it. He certainly cancelled some grants of land recited in it. Persons existed whose interest it was to claim under it, but no one ever did so, although it was difficult to believe that none of them knew of it. For nearly 30 years no one ever thought of asserting any claim under it.

Held, on these facts, that the District Judge was right in coming to the conclusion that the will had been revoked.

The revocation of a Hindu will in the Mofussil does not depend on any English ordinance or code; and actual destruction or a formal revocation in writing is not essential to

In Welck v. Phillips (1 Moo. P. C. 299.) Baron Parke expressed the view that when a will is traced to the possession of the deceased and is not forthcoming at his death the presumption is that he has destroyed it. In view of the habits and conditions of the people of India this rule of law, if it can be so-called, must be applied with considerable caution.

In the present case the deceased was a very old man and, towards the end of his life, almost imbecile. There is nothing definite to show that he had any motive to destroy the will or was mentally competent to do so. On the other hand the circumstances favour the view that the will was either mislaid or stolen. The learned Judges of the Court below were therefore perfectly competent to arrive at the finding that the will had not been revoked. (Mr. Ameer Ali.) PADMAN v. HANWANTA. (1915) 18 M. L. statement in reply to inquiries by the Government under circular orders regarding the succession of talookdars. The statement was as follows :—"I am talukdar of J. Whereas the Government has been pleaded to confer upon me the proprietary rights in this estate, to be enjoyed from generation to generation, I do hereby request that after my death my estate may be maintained intact and without partition according to Raj Gaddi custom, and that, owing to my not having a male issue, Z, my daughter, shall be considered entitled to succession and inheritance. But as I have taken T from my brother M, and have commenced to bring him up and educate him as my son if he finishes his education during my lifetime and is marred to Z, he shall after me succeed to my estate as my adopted son".

The above document was held to be a will within the definition in S. 2 of Act I of 1869, and the question was whether it was revoked by a formal will of F, the talookdar, dated 19-8-1879. In that will F said that no document of any sort purporting to be a will or petition, the context whereof was wholly or partly repugnant to it, should be deemed to be admissible.

The material portions of the will of a Parsi, who had two sons, P & J, were these : The said two sons are proprietors, half and half alike, and in equal (shares), of my whole estate. Both the heirs are to take care of the said estate and look after it, and both the heirs living together, are duly to enjoy the balance which may remain after payment of the Sarkar's assessment. In this my testamentary writing, I, the testator have appointed my two sons as (my) heirs.

The will then stated that P, the elder, was in a confused state of mind, and that J was accordingly entrusted with the management of the estate "by his true and pure integrity, and both the heirs are to equally enjoy half and half alike the whole estate with unanimity with P in such a way as not to injure P's rights."

"At present P has no male issue of his body. He has only a daughter. Therefore, if P gets a male issue, half of the estate is to be made over to him, on his attaining his full age."

The eleventh clause of the will ran thus : 'I, the testator, have in the socond clause of this will appinted my two sons, P & J as my heirs. The wife of P has now gone to her father's house. On her return, if she, by instigating her husband, or by any (other way) cause to be mortgaged, sold, given in gift, charity, etc., or disposed of, whatsoever in any way to any one, any immoveable and moveable estate, etc. appertaining to the half share during the lifetime of P or, after his death, my son P, or his wife, or daughter, or any (other) person (shall) as stated in the third clause of this will have no authority, power and right to do so. If my son P does not get a son, J is to give away his son as P's palak (or his adopted son). All the clauses of this will are applicable to the said adopted (son). If a son be born of the body of P he (shall) on his attaining (his) full age be the owner of half share in the whole of the immoveable and moveable estate belonging to me. My heir and executor J or his heirs shall raise no objection to give him the share. It they raise any objection, the responsibility arising therefrom is on their hands. All the clauses written in this will are applicable to the said son of (his body)."

P & J survived the testator, and J entered upon the management of the whole estate, having obtained probate of the will. This state of matters lasted for 30 years, when P died. He had no son, but was alleged to have adopted , as his palak, B, J's son.

A suit by the widow and other representatives of P, who were his heirs according to the Parsi Intestate Succession Act, 1865, for an account, for an ascertainment of the rights and interests of the parties in the estate, and for partition, was resisted by J and B on the grounds that, under the will, one-half of the estate did not vest in P, and that B, as palak of P, succeeded in terms of the settlement to the half of the estate which P had enjoyed.

Held, that under the terms of the will one half of the estate conveyed vested in P a morte testatoris and that the right of P was not restricted to that of enjoyment, either for life or until the majority of his own son (77-8).

Held also, agreeing with the High Court, that, even assuming that there was no executory bequest to B as palak, it would be void under S. 111 of the Indian Succession Act, because the bequest to B as palak was to take effect upon the happening of an uncertain event, namely, if no son was born to P, and no time was mentioned in the will for the occurrence of the event (78). The will of M, a Hindu, addressed to his brother A, after stating that he had a half-share in the joint property of himself and A, and giving directions for the payment of debts and the maintenance of his wife and son and daughter and the education of the son and other matters, said, "God forbid but if my minor son should die and my daughter should get married and a grandson be born, then on the said grandson's attaining majority you will give him half of my share whatever it may be and give half to your son.... you shall account for and make over whatever remains of the estate after payment of debts to my son when he comes of age....Further if my only son dies before he gets children my wife may with your consent adopt a son."

Held, on a construction of the will, that the direction to make over the estate to the son when he came of age had the effect of a gift to him to take effect at that time, and that the words "If my minor son dies" in order to be consistent with that must mean "dies during minority" (170). The material passages in the will of a Hindu testator were the following:—

First paragraph.—My five sons, after my death, all continuing joint in food being unanimous, will preserve and look after my real and personal properties, etc., and business, trading business, etc., whomsoever, whatever there are the same, they will carry on conformably to the directions hereinafter written, they will perform the daily usual acts, etc., should they disagree and wish to separate, then deducting my real and personal properties and business, trading business, etc., they shall be unable to make and take a partition and division and demarcation, on account of my regulated acts, ceremonies, etc., and family expenses, and the profits and losses of the trading business, and after deducting the establishment charges, the surplus proceeds, the money that shall remain out of the same they will receive their respective shares.

Held, on a construction of the will, that the interest given by the will to the testators was not accurately represented by the words "joint estate" in England, but that the interest was, as regards succession, more analogous to the tenancy in common which prevails in England (59).

The testator has directed his sons, using the words, "continuing joint in food," to take care of and look after his property, moveable and immoveable, and carry on his trading business. It is to be observed that this interest is not accurately represented by the words "joint estate" in England, for if he had given the property simply to the sons, with no further direction than that they should live jointly in respect of food, and one of the sons had died, his share, with all the accretions, would have gone to his heir, to the person who was entitled to inherit according to the Hindu law, so that in point of fact the interest was, as regards succession, more analogous to the tenancy in common which prevails in England (59). ———Eldest son to be born—Bequest to—Estate conveyed—Vesting—Time of—Estate to remain in hands of executors until sons attain majority—Direction for—Effect.

Clause 11 of the will of a Hindu provided that all his residuary estate "shall descend in equal shares to the eldest son to be born to each of the daughters of my late brother, who are now alive. The sons of those daughters shall, after their birth, remain under the control of the executor, until they attain majority at the expiry of 21 years and, whenever the eldest son of any of the ladies shall attain majority, the executor will make over his share to his satisfaction."

Cl. 15 declared that, "until the majority of whoever may be the eldest at the time amongst the sons of my brother's daughters, the estate shall remain in the hands of the executor absolutely and for all purposes."

At the death of the testator, in 1857, two daughters of his brother were living, of whom C was married and F unmarried. C had a son born in 1858, who lived to be 21 years of age, and to whom, on his attaining that age, a moiety of the estate was made over by the executor. F married W in 1878, the only issue of the marriage being a son born in 1883, who lived only a few hours.

Held that, a moiety of the estate vested in the sons of C and F on their birth. The vesting of the estate in the son was not suspended by the direction that the estate should remain in the hands of the executor, who should "make over the share" of each on his attaining 21 years; those words merely pointed to the possession and enjoyment of the shares which had already been vested. The words "the sons of those daughters" following the bequest referred to the sons to whom it was made, namely, the eldest son of each daughter. On the birth of F's son, therefore, a moiety of the estate vested in him, and on his death passed to his father as his heir. (Sir Richard Couch.) HARRIS v. BROWN.

By his will a Hindu governed by the Bengal law gave property to his four sons and their offspring in the male line, as a joint family. K, one of the sons, died, leaving three sons including H, and H died leaving no male offspring. The family continued joint up to the death of H.

Held that, upon the true construction of the will, upon the death of H, his share of the joint estate passed to his heir, his widow, so far as she was entitled to her widow's estate. (87.)

There are directions in the will that the property is to go in the male line to the sons and their descendants, but one of them dies leaving no issue in the male line, and the will is silent as to what the disposition of the property is to be in that event. It is a share of the property of the joint family, descendible, therefore, to the heir to whom that property would go in the absence of any provision made by the will. That heir is the widow of H (87). (Lord Justice Turner.) SONATUN BYSACK v. SREEMUTTY JUGGUTSOONDREE DOSSEE.

By his will a Hindu bequeathed his property, including a trading business, to his sons absolutely with a direction that, in the event of the death of any of them without leaving a a son, his share was to go over to the other sons. It was contended for the surviving brothers that inasmuch as the Company's paper had been indorsed and transferred to them in A's, lifetime, in anticipation of his death, they were entitled to the same as against his widow. Held, overruling their contention, that the indorsement and handing over of the Notes was a mere ordinary partnership transaction for the purpose of enabling the partners to realise part of the assets of the partnership, which would not affect the right that each son had to his share of the profits, not giving to the son, who had died, the exclusive right to the Company's paper which he so even indorsed, though taken in his name alone, but only making it a part of the assets of the partnership, in which he would be entitled to his share after the expenses of partnership were duly discharged (64). By his will, after giving directions for the sale, conversion and investment of his real and personal estate and constituting thereout a residuary trust fund (therein called "the trust funds"), a testator directed that for a period of 21 years after his death certain shares or parts only of the income of the trust funds should be paid and applied as therein mentioned, and the residue of the income of the trust funds should be accumulated by investing the same and the resulting income thereof to the intent that such accumulations should be added to and form part of the corpus of the trust funds. And after certain immaterial directions the testator made a final direction and bequest in the terms following: "And I direct my trustees on the expiration of 21 years after the date of my death to divide my trust funds into five shares and to pay one of such shares to my said wife and such share shall be held to vest in her at the date of my death and to pay one other of such shares to each of my four sons and in the event of any such son of mine dying before the expiration of such period of 21 years leaving child or children him surviving such child or children and if more than one equally between them shall take the share to which such son of mine would have been entitled if he had survived such period of 21 years and in default of issue of any son the share of such son shall be payable to the surviving sons equally between them subject to such provision as my trustees shall think fit in their absolute discretion to make for the surviving widow of any son."

It was contended that the gift to the children of a deceased son was not of that son's original share only, but of the share to which he would have been entitled had he survived the period of 21 years; and that, in considering what the son would have been entitled to in that event, the court should have regard to the subsequent hypothetical enlargement of the son's share by possible survivorship.

Held, overruling the contention, that the child of a son who died before the expiration of the period was entitled only to the one-fifth share which his father would have taken, and was not entitled to participate in the share of a son who died before the expiration of the period without issue.

On the true construction of the will, the interest of each of the sons in his one-fifth, though postponed in possession for 21 years, is immediately, though not indefeasibly, vested and is liable to be divested and given over should he die before the expiration of the term of 21 years from the testator's death; and in that case two alternative and mutually exclusive events are considered and provided for in somewhat loose language. In the first event, namely, of his death, leaving a child or children him surviving—the share he would have been entitled to had he survived is given to such child or children. In the second event, namely, of his death without leaving issue—his share is given to the surviving sons. The contention urged appears to amount to an attempt to combine the result of the two mutually exclusive alternatives, and to take from a surviving son in favour of his nephews or nieces a part of the share of a deceased and childless brother which, under the second alternative gift, is given in its entirety to the surviving son. It seems impossible to do this without contradicting to this extent the second alternative gift, and the only way of avoiding such a construction, and yet arriving at the result advocated, would be to read the phrase "surviving sons" as meaning surviving by themselves or by their issue. Such a construction would be contrary to well-established principles. (Sir Charles Sargant.) GANAPATHY PILLAY v. ALAMELOO.

———Wife—Houses bequeathed to, and after her death to sons—Estate taken by latter in—Absolute estate—Life estate as tenants in common.

Clause 8 of the will of a Hindu was in these terms:—

"Along with all these (appurtenances) I have given (the houses) to my wife N, (for her) to enjoy the income thereof. Whatever rent may be received for those houses my wife N, herself, may take, may enjoy, may spend, and (she) may make donations for religious and charitable purposes (dharm). She cannot be questioned by my 'executors' and 'trustees' and heirs. A, 'trust deed' for these houses shall be made and delivered by my 'executors' and 'trustees' and heirs to my wife N. In the same the authority to take the whole of the income during her lifetime is hers, and these houses cannot be sold and cannot be mortgaged by any one. On the death of my wife, N, my sons, B & D, both (these) persons, deducting the expenses, may take in equal shares, half and half, the income thereof that may be received, and may enjoy, may expend, and may make donations for religious and charitable purposes (dharm), and the heirs also of both these, my sons, may always take the income from time to time, and may divide and take the income.

Both the courts below held on the construction of that clause in the will that B & D took a life interest only in the houses as tenants in common, and that the ulterior interests therein, not being validly disposed of fell into the residue.

Will—Testamentary power

———Ancient Hindu law.

In the ancient Hindu law, as it was understood through the whole of Hindustan, testamentary instruments, in the sense affixed by English lawyers to that expression, were unknown ; and it is stated by a writer of authority (Sir Thomas Strange) that the Hindu language has no terms to express what we mean by a will. But it does not necessarily follow, that what, in effect, though not in form, are testamentary instruments, which are only to come into operation and affect property after the death of the maker of the instrument, were equally unknown. However this may be, the strictness of the ancient law has long since been relaxed (344). (Mr. Pemberton Leigh.) NAGALUTCHME UMMAL v. GOPOO NADARAJA CHETTY. (1856) 6 M. I. ESTATE UNKNOWN TO LAW CREATED THROUGH MEDIUM OF.

If the intended effect of the argument was to bring distinctly under the notice of their Lordships the contention that under the guise of an unnecessary trust of inheritance the testator could not indirectly create beneficiary estates of a character unauthorized by law, and which could not directly be given without the intervention of the trust, their Lordships adopt that argument upon the ground that a man cannot be allowed to do by indirect means what is forbidden to be done directly, and that the trusts can only be sustained to the extent and for the purpose of giving effect to those beneficiary interests which the law recognises, and that after the determination of those interests the beneficial interest in the residue of the property remains in the

There is not only difficulty in the execution of the trust, because the court does not know upon what property to lay its hands, but the uncertainty in the subject of the gift has a reflex action upon the previous words, and throws doubt upon the intention of the testator, and seems to shew that he could not possibly have intended his words of confidence, hope, or whatever they may be,—his appeal to the conscience of the first taker, —to be imperative words (79-80.) VOID TRUSTS—ESTATES CREATED THROUGH MEDIUM OF.

———Validity of.

It was argued that the will is void by reason of its being founded upon the creation of an estate in trustees, absorbing the whole interest in the property, and out of which the interests of the beneficiaries are to be fed. It was maintained that an estate, to be held in trust, can have no existence by the Hindu law, and that, as the foundation of the will fails, the whole superstructure must fall. This argument gives the go-by to the consideration that if the trusts be void, they are not illegal, and that if they are struck out as void, the estates capable of being created by the will, and which the trusts were introduced to secure and maintain, would thereby become impressed directly upon the estate, subject to the charges for legacies and annuities which on all hands are admitted to be valid, as, for instance, upon a gift by a will to receive and pay A an annuity, and subject thereto in trust for B; if the trust be void, it should be simply struck out and B would have the property, subject to the annuity (71). Will—Widow.

———Bequest to—Estate conveyed—Absolute estate—Malik—Effect.

The material clauses of a will were in these terms:—

I give my wife permission to adopt five sons in succession. If my wife aforesaid should adopt a son in accordance with the authority given by me, the aforesaid adopted son and my wife aforesaid shall succeed to the ownership of the entire properties in equal shares, vested with the power of sale and gift; and no violation of such provisions shall be permitted. In the event of disagreement between my adopted son and my wife my estate shall be divided equally among my adopted son and my wife aforesaid, and after my death my wife aforesaid shall take out probate of this will, and when the adopted son attains to the age of twenty-one, my wife aforesaid shall make over his estate to him.

Para. 4 of the will provided as follows:—"If the aforesaid adopted son, or my wife aforesaid should find it necessary to sell any of the properties left by me, they shall be entitled to sell it to a stranger, if my heirs and co-sharers refuse to purchase it for an adequate consideration."

And the last paragraph ran thus:—" If no son is taken in adoption by my wife (which was the event which had occurred) she shall succeed to all the properties left by me after my death, with power of sale and gift, and my wife aforesaid shall be malik, and be in possession, and she shall have power of sale and gift in accordance with the provisions in paragraph 4."

Held that it was clear from every one of the provisions of the will that the tostator's intention was to give the absolute property to the wife—either in the whole of the property, or, if there was an adopted son, in one half of the property.

The provision in para. 4 of the will only means that before selling a portion to a stranger, which the widow has perfect right to do, she shall offer it—or give the opportunity of purchasing it at an adequate consideration—to the co-heirs. That by no means limits her power of sale in any degree. SUDAMANI DAS v. SURAT LAL DAS. (1923) 18 L.W. 86 = (1923) P.C. 65 = L. R. 4 P. C. 115 = (1923) M.W.N. 601 = 38 C.L.J. 253 = 73 I. It is desired that the said Mussamats by holding possession and occupation of all the moveable and immoveable properties should pay the Government revenue thereof, and they should collect rent of, and keep watch over, the mauzas either in entirety or in part and scattered lands, oxen, and elephants, etc., and they should give alms and charities. ———Bequest to—Estate conveyed—Widow's estate at the least.

A will executed by an Oudh talookdar ran as follows:—"Whereas my intention as regards making any boy representative has not yet become fixed, I, therefore, for the present, declare the aforesaid Maharani" (his wife) "representative, and proprietor, of my estate, and property, moveable and immoveable; until she make some one representative, let her remain representative, like myself, without power to aliene; and as regards my property, moveable and immoveable, no sharer or partner has any claim. Therefore, having written these few words of the nature of a will, I have deposited with the Government, that it may remain a record, and be of use in time of need."

Held, on a construction of the will, that, until the Maharanee had appointed another to be owner and representative. her estate in the talook was sufficient to constitute her the full representative of it, that her estate was at least as large as that of a Hindu widow in her husband's property (207).

The words in the will declaring the Maharanee "representative and proprietor of my estate; until she make some one representative, let her remain representative, like myself, without power to aliene" in their natural meaning plainly disclose an intention to vest the whole estate in the Maharanee, until she should divest hereself of it "by making some one else representative," and the words are sufficient and aptwards to accomplish this intention (206).

As if to leave no doubt of his wish to make his widow proprietor of the talook, until by her own act she appointed another, the Maharajah adds that until she does so she is to remain representative "like myself;" the plain meaning of these words being that until such appointment she was to own and represent the estate as fully as he himself owned and represented it (207).

It is not necessary to consider whether the prohibition against alienation was or was not an effectual restraint; for, however that may be, it is clear that this provision would not prevent the vesting of the whole estate in the Maharanee (207).

The will of a Jain ran as follows:—"I alone am the owner of the immoveable and moveable properties. If a male issue be born to me, then he shall remain (shall be) the owner. Should perchance a son be not born to me, then (in that case) my heir is C. Should the heir (i.e) a son be born to C, then he shall be the heir in the future. Should perchance no son be born to C and should it be necessary to bring (a son) from (some) other place, then during the lifetime of my wife (a son) from our Gotra shall be brought (adopted) with the consent of my wife. Hereafter, in connection with the adoption of a son C's wife shall have no authority. I appoint C (to be) my heir. He shall act under the orders of my wife."

On the same date that the will was executed C, the respondent, signed a writing addressed to the following effect:—

"Further, if you appoint me your heir, I shall conduct myself towards you and the worshipful and respected kakiji just as a child (conducts) himself towards (and) obeys the orders of his parents, I will not ever chauge in (such my) conduct (towards you). You may rest assured as to (such conduct on) my part.....you have made (your) testamentary writing. I will act agreeably to the same in all respects. If perchance a son be not born to me and if it be necessary to take (a boy) in adoption, I will take one in adoption during the lifetime of the worshipful and the respected Kakiji Sahib, according to the directions of the worshipful and respected Kakiji Saheb."

The testator died leaving no issue, and in a suit by his widow against C it was contended on behalf of the widow that under the terms of the will the testator did not dispose of his estate during her lifetime; that there was therefore an intestacy under which the plaintiff was entiIled to a Hindu widow's estate.

Held, affirming the court below that the widow took no interest under the will, and that her only right was a right of maintinance and residence.

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

It was argued that the authority given to the wife in the letter procured from the respondent by the testator shows an intention on the part of the testator to leave his wife in a position of a Hindu widow, and that having regard to this provision in the will their Lordships ought to assume the testator's intention of desiring his wife to be in the same position as if he had died intestate. Such an intention cannot be implied in a case where the testator has made a will in which he has deliberately made no express provision with reference to the widow. N, the last male owner of the Medur estate, died a minor and unmarried in August 1895. The Court of Wards had taken charge of the Medur estate during his minority and continued to be in charge of it until December, 1895, when a Receiver, appointed by a Civil Court having jurisdiction, took possession of it. The estate continued to be in charge of Receivers, duly appointed, until after 1902. Part of the estate consisted of Government Promissory notes which the Court of Wards had held in respect of moneys received from the Medur estate before August, 1895, the date of the death of N, and of moneys paid into the Bank by the Receivers and the Government Promissory Notes and other securities in which moneys derived from the Medur estate were invested under the control of the Civil Court for the benefit of those who might be entitled to the estate.

Shortly after N's death, his natural mother, V, claimed to be entitled to the Medur estate, and the properties appertaining to it as such. Her claim was opposed by another lady who claimed to be entitled to succeed to N as his adoptive mother. V thereupon instituted a suit on 21—10—1895, for a declaration that the alleged adoption of N was invalid, and also claimed to be placed in possession of the Medur estate with all the savings, appurtenances, etc., of the estate, That suit was finally disposed of by the Privy Council in 1913 in favour of V. While that suit was pending, V, in 1899, executed a will, clauses 5 and 6 of which were as follows :—

5. The Government Promissory Notes and cash relating to the Medur estate which have been in the custody of the court till this day, as well as the interest accruing thereon till payment of the amount, shall be divided into four shares, and out of them, one share shall be given to my elder brother T, and three shares to my younger brother C.

6. Out of the Government Promissory Notes and cash of the Medur estate which are remaining in deposit in court and the jewels, etc., the amounts specified hereunder shall be first expended and only out of the remaining amount, one share shall, as stated in paragraph 5, be paid to my elder brother, and three shares to my younger brother."

Cl. 6 set out the particulars of the expenses to be incurred, they being a number of legacies to be paid to named persons. V died a few months after the execution of the said will.

Held, that, on the true construction of the said clauses of the will, V only dealt therein with the promissory notes to which she was absolutely entitled as representing moneys which had been received after her son's death by the Court of Wards as the Receivers, and did not bequeath those promissory notes which represented moneys which had been received by the Court of Wards before the death of N, and that she was perfectly entitled to dispose of what she did (225). If words are used in the will of a Hindu testator conferring absolute ownership upon his wife, the wife enjoys the rights of ownership without their being conferred by express and additional terms, unless the circumstances or the context are sufficient to show that such absolute ownership was not intended. R died, having left a will which he expressed in the following terms :—"I give to my wife the whole of my property, both real and personal, including my Government promissory notes, Delhi Bank shares, my house at F, together with all my plate and plated ware, and whatever money, furniture, carriages, horses, etc., may be in my possession at the time of my decease, together with all moneys due or which may afterwards become due, feeling confident that she will act justly to our children in dividing the same when no longer required by her."

Held, upon the construction of the will, that the wife took an absolute interest (80).

HINDU LAW—(Contd.)

Will—Wife—(Contd.)

Considering the nature of the property, which includes a number of articles as to some of which the use is equivalent to the consumption; to the nature of the first gift, which, although not expressed in terms to be an absolute gift, is quite unlimited, and is legally an absolute gift; and to the fact that the first gift is only cut down by words which do not constitute a direct gift, but are to operate through an influence upon the conscience and feelings of the wife, their Lordships cannot come to any other conclusion than that the testator intended his wife to use the property according to her requirements. That is equivalent to an absolute gift to the wife (80). (Sir Arthur Hobhouse.) MUSSOORIE BANK v. RAYNOR. (1882) 9 I. A. 70 = 4 A. 500 (510-1) = 4 Sar. 346.

———Absolute estate to—Bequest of—Direction that whatever property there might remain after her death she should leave the said property to daughters in such manner as she might like—Effect of—Expression of which merely or creation of obligation also.

The will of a Hindu, after constituting his wife the absolute owner of all his properties, provided: "And as to whatever property there may remain after her death my wife shall leave the said property to my two daughters in such manner as she may like (either) by making a 'will' or by making (some) other instrument."

Quære whether, as held by one of the Judges in appeal, the words suggesting how the property should be left after the death of the testator's widow were in themselves inadequate to do anything more than to express a wish and did not create an obligation (8). ———Absolute estate to—Bequest of—Direction that she should leave to daughters "whatever property there may remain after her death"—Trust in favour of daughters if created by—Horwood v. West—Rule in—Applicability of.

By clause 2 of his will a Guzarati Hindu appointed his wife as his sole executrix. In the next clause, after stating that as he had no son he appointed his wife to be his heir; and the clause continued in these words: "And I constitute her the owner. And as to whatever property there may remain after her death my wife shall leave the said property to my two daughters in such manner as she may like (either) by making a 'will' or by making (some) other instrument. Of my two daughters one named J, has now become a widow. To her and to (my) other daughter D, who has been married to S, (i. e.,) to both of them my wife shall give (my) property in such manner as (she) may like."

By later clauses of the will the testator referred to powers that he desired his wife to enjoy; for example, by clause 6 he expressly stated that he gave his wife authority to do what she thought right with the profits and the ready moneys of a shop where he carried on business, and further to continue in partnership with the partners if she so desired. By clause 18 he provided that after there had been defrayed out of the rents of certain specified immovable property the expenses in connection with a religious object, for which he had made provision, the wife should apply the surplus for her maintenance and use and for the maintenance and use of her daughters if they were living with her, and if the surplus were insufficient she should deal with the movable and immovable properties in such manner as she thought fit. By clause 20, again, he gave express power to his wife to mortgage, lease, sell and use the properties. Finally by clause 23 he provided that after the death of his wife his daughters should be named executrixes, and he gave them authority to deal with or manage the whole of his property and effects;

Held that the will conferred an absolute estate on the testator's wife, and that even assuming that it was intended to create a trust in favour of his daughters and the words were sufficient for that purpose the subject matter on which the trust was to operate was by the terms of the will too uncertain to enable the Court to give it administration (8).

The principle stated in Herwood v. West would be applicable to this will as it would to a will in England. The Vice-Chancellor says: It is essential to the execution of a trust that the subject should be certain; and if this testator intended that his wife should, at her pleasure, during her life, dispose of the property which he left to her, and that his recommendation should extend only to what, if anything, happened to remain of his property at her death undisposed of by her then there is no trust to be administered by this Court." ———Absolute estate to—Bequest of—"Malik"—Use of—Effect.

By a deed of gift or testamentary instrument, a Hindu made a gift of properties to his two wives and to his daughter-in-law on the conditions that during his lifetime he should remain in possession of the said properties as theretofore, and that after his death they the donees should get their names recorded in the public records in respect of their respective properties given to them and remain in possession "as owners with proprietary powers." The words translated, "as owners with proprietary powers," were in the original "Malikwa Khud ishtiyar."

Held, on a construction of the deed, that the second wife acquired a right to alienate the property given to her by the deed.

There is nothing in the context or surrounding facts to displace the presumption of absolute ownership implied in the word "malik." On the other hand the context strengthens the presumption that the intention was that "Malik" should bear its proper technical meaning. The gift to the testator's daughter-in-law is made in precisely the same terms. In her case the gift is admittedly a full proprietary right. The phrase should be made to bear the same interpretation in the cases of the wives also. (Lord Collins.) SURAJMANI v. RABI NATH OJHA. (1907) 35 I. A. 17 = 30 A. 84 (89-90) = 12 C. W. according to a very well-known and well-established class of cases, have been void, because of the uncertainty. ———Bequest to—Re-marriage—Gift over in event of—Death of wife during lifetime of testator—Estate taken by her in case of—Gift over if takes effect in such case—Income only given to wife for some years and corpus given to her absolutely thereafter.

After sundry specific bequests, a Chinese testator constituted a trust Fund the income of which was disposed of by clause 16 as follows :—

" My trustees shall divide the income derived from my trust fund among my said wife and my said three sons in equal shares (but should my wife marry again) I direct that her one-fourth share in the income aforesaid shall cease and be then equally divided among my said three sons "; and the corpus by clause 17 as follows :—

" My trustees shall, immediately on the expiration of 12 years after my death divide my trust fund among my wife and children aforesaid in equal shares provided that should my wife marry again before the period of distribution of my trust fund I direct that her share in my trust fund shall be given to my said sons in equal shares."

The will was in English, and it fell to be construed according to the English Law of wills, as laid down in English decisions. The testator's wife predeceased him. It was contended for the sons that, truly construed, the gift over to the sons took effect in the event which happened, and not merely in the event actually expressed. They contended that the gift over must be read as a gift to them " should my wife marry again or die." Relying upon the principle enunciated by Parker J, in Seaton's case, (1913) 2 Ch. 618, they urged that as the testator meant his wife's interest to be a life interest, he could not be supposed to have intended that if she did not intend to re-marry and thereby bring the very words of the gift into operation she might in that event take an interest absolute.

Held, that clause 17 of the will was decisive against the contention.

The provision in clause 17 negatives any presumed intention that the wife should never have more than a life interest for it excludes that general intention from which any extension of the gift over to cover the event of her death is to be implied. ———Bequest to, " feeling confident that she will act justly to our children in dividing the same when no longer required by her"—Application of doctrine of precatory trusts to—Estate taken by wife.

By his will a testator gave the whole of his property, both real and personal, to his wife, " feeling confident that she will act justly to our children in dividing the same when so longer required by her."

Held that upon the true construction of the will the wife took an absolute interest, and that to apply the doctrine of precatory trusts to it would be a very large extension of that doctrine (80-1).

No case has been cited, and probably no case could be cited, in which the doctrine of precatory trusts has been held to prevail when the property said to be given over is only given when no longer required by the first taker (79). Their Lordships think that substantially the words " when no longer required by her " must in this will be taken to have the same meaning as if the testator had said, " I give ———Estate bequeathed to—Life estate—Absolute estate—Testamentary power conferred on her—Nature of—General testamentary power or power according to oral directions of testator.

A Parsi testator made a will by clause 3 whereof, after reciting that he had two sons, and a wife, he appointed his wife as his executrix with full powers of management. By clause 4, after referring to his immoveable and moveable property of all kinds, he proceeded : " Of all that I duly make my wife 'malik muktiyar' (absolute owner) during her life, just as I am the owner, and during her life none of my other heirs, representatives or relatives or kinsmen can question her in regard to any matter whatever."

Clause 7 was as follows : "7. Agreeably to what is written above, my wife shall, during her lifetime, duly carry on vahivat (i. e., management) in respect of every kind of my property and effects and make expenses on auspicious and inauspicious occasions just as I (have been doing). And in her lifetime, keeping God and Meher Daver (the Dispenser of Justice) before her mind, my wife shall duly, as I have directed her orally, and according to the times, make her will, and all my heirs and the heirs of my heirs shall duly act agreeably to the same."

Clause 8 commenced with the following words " Should my wife, that is to say, executrix die without making her will, that is to say, testamentary writing, as mentioned in paragraph 7 above, then both my sons shall duly become malik " (i.e. owners) " in equal shares of all kinds of my property and effects, and both of them shall duly take certificate " (that is, obtain probate) " from the court."

Clause 10 contained certain dispositions which were to take effect if the testator's wife died without making a will and if any of his sons should die before his wife. The will concluded as follows : " I have made this will of my free will and pleasure and while in sound mind and consciousness. My wife and children, that is to say, heirs, all shall duly act agreeably to the same."

Held, that, on a true construction of the will, the testator's wife took a life interest only, and not an absolute interest, under it, and that under clause 7 thereof she took a general power of testamentary disposition, and not merely a power exercisable in manner specified in his oral directions (73-4).

It is plain from the direction to the testator's heirs to act agreeably to his wife's will, as well as from the gifts over, that the words in clause 7 were intended to give to the testator's wife some power of testamentary disposition over his estate. The question is, whether he meant that she should, in accordance with his oral directions, make her will disposing of the property as she should in her discretion think fit, or whether he intended that she should by her will dispose of the property in accordance with his oral directions. In their Lordship's opinion, the former is the true view (74). (Viscount Cave.) SHIRINBAI v. RATANBAI. (1921) 48 I. A. 69 = 45 B. 711 (716) = 19 A. L. J. 215 = (1921) M. W. N. 165 = 29 M. L. A Hindu made a will by which he bequeathed some properties to his younger wife and her son in the following terms:—"The remaining four annas share I give to you Srimati Rani Doorga Kumari and the son born of your womb, Jogeswar Narain Deo, for your maintenance." His intention with regard to the interests which were to pass under that gift to the mother and son, was declared as follows: "Upon my death you and your son and grandson, etc., in due order of succession, shall hold possession of the zemindari, etc.,....And I give to you the power of making alienation by sale or gift." Held that the mother and son took equal interests under the will, each taking an estate of inheritance to the extent of two annas share in the zemindari and that the mother was entitled to alienate her two annas share at her discretion without any regard to anybody else.

The words "for your maintenance" are quite capable of signifying that the gift was made for the purpose of enabling them (the donees) to live in comfort, and do not merely mean that it was to be limited to a bare right of maintenance.

If there had been a gift to the Rani alone in these terms, there could hardly have been a doubt that it would have conferred upon her an estate of inheritance, with power of alienation; and their Lordships cannot understand why the same terms, when equally applied to her and her son, should be held to confer upon her any lesser interest. The relevant words of the will of Hindu were:—" My elder wife shall have the right of residence for the term of her natural life in the three-storied portion of my house No. 35, Ram Kamal Mukerjee's Street."

At a partition between the appellant, the son of the elder wife, and the respondent, his half-brother, the three-storied portion of the house was allotted to the appellant, subject to the right of residence of his mother during her life. In 1899, the appellant's right, title and interest in that portion of the house was sold in execution of a decree. The execution purchaser resold to the respondent in 1917. The execution purchase was expressed to be subject to the right of residence of the elder widow. She resided exclusively in the portion throughout, and the appellant lived with her. After the sale to the respondent, the appellant instituted a suit for a declaration that ever since the execution sale he had been in possession of the house adversely to the execution purchaser and had thus acquired a complete title by adverse possession before the purchase by the respondent.

Held, affirming the High Court, that, under the will, the elder widow had the right of exlcusive residence in the house for her life, that neither the appellant nor the execution purchaser had any right to possession of the house during her life and that the possession of the appellant must be deemed to have been by her permission and was not adverse to the execution purchaser. The material part of the will of a Hindu widow was as follows:—"Under the will of my husband I am the sole owner in possession (malik-o-quabiz) of his entire estate and possess all proprietary powers...I bequeath the entire estate of my husband to F subject to the following conditions:—(1) So long as I live, I shall continue to be the owner in possession of the entire estate, the subject of the will, and possess all the powers, such as making sales, mortgages, gifts, etc.....(4) I have bequeathed Mauza K, with all the property, to G, the daughter of my priest (prohit). After my death she shall be the owner in possession of the entire property in Mouzah K aforesaid."

Held that, on the true construction of the will, G took an absolute estate in Mauza K.

The expressions "I shall continue to be the owner in possession of the entire estate, the subject of the will, and possess all the powers such as (those of) making sales, mortgages, gifts," etc., do not abate from the completeness of the ownership and possession conferred by condition 4 upon G, nor do they fortify it in any way whatever (186).

The words "malik-o-qabiz" translated "owner in possession" are truly "owner and possessor of." It is now settled that the words "malik-o-qabiz" signify a full ownership in property. A Hindu lady, who took under the will of her father-in-law a life estate and who was held to be very much in the position of a Hindu widow, sold an estate of the testator to the defendant by a conveyance in which she purported to give him an absolute title, what in England would be called an estate in fee simple. The sale was made for the purpose of paying the testator's debts, and the question for decision was whether the sale could be held to have been made for the necessary purpose of paying the testator's debts, and was therefore valid and binding.

It appeared that the testator possessed an income of somewhere about a lakh of rupees, minus the Government revenue of Rs. 20,000, leaving him an income in round numbers of about £8,000 per annum. He was shewn to have owed a debt of Rs. 10,000 at the time of his death, that is £1,000. It was pretended that sixteen years afterwards a necessity arose for selling a considerable portion of his real estate, to pay that debt of £1,000, plus some £400 which had been subsequently contracted by the lady.

Held, affirming the Courts below, that the mere statement of facts altogether disposed of the contention that the estate could have been sold for the necessary purpose of paying the testator's debts (16-7). (Sir Robert P. Collier.) MAHOMED SHUMSOOL v. SHEWUKRAM.

———The Maharajah of Balrampur, a Hindu of the Junwar Kshatriya caste, had an illegitimate son, J. B., by a Mahomedan woman. The evidence in the case showed that the Maharajah treated J. B. as a Hindu in religion, desired that others should so treat him, procured his marriages with two ladies of the Kshatriya caste, treated those marriages as lawful marriages and the offspring of those unions as legitimate, and desired that others should so treat and regard them. The evidence further showed that in that frame of mind he made a codicil to his will which provided that Rs. 48,000 per annum should be paid to J. B. "and his issue (aulad) for generation after generation so long as the family (khandan) of J. B. and his issue (aulad) remain in existence," and that after the death of J. B. "from among his issue (aulad) one person, to whom the right may go, shall be considered the proprietor of this maintenance allowance, without division, as a rais'. The codicil allocated certain villages to meet those payments and provided that J. B. and his family descendants should hold possession of them in perpetuity. In a suit brought by the eldest of four illegitimate sons of J. B. by a Mahomaden mistress [illegible] being also the eldest born of J. B.'s sons, legitimate or otherwise, against the only son of J. B. by one of his Kshatriya wives, the other having only a daughter, to recover the property allocated by the codicil or alternatively the share to which he was entitled, it was contended that inasmuch as J. B. was by birth a Mahomedan his marriage with a Kshatriya lady was not lawful, and the first respondent, the offspring of that union was also illegitimate, and that plaintiff as the eldest born son of J. B. was entitled to the property under the terms of the codicil as against the first respondent.

Held that, having regard to all the evidence in the case and the provisions of the codicil itself, the intention of the testator plainly was to treat the marriages of J. B. with the two Kshatriya women mentioned above as valid marriages and the issue of those marriages as legitimate issue. ———Ordinary meaning—General meaning—Words having—Subjecting of, to limitations which words do not necessarily imply—Propriety.

There is nothing specifically either English or Indian in the idea that the will of a testator must be construed on that principle which would enable courts of law most fully to give effect to the intention expressed by his words. It may be that if the words he employs are voces signatae they must be so accepted, whatever the suspicion may be as to the testator having had that particular view of his own language. But in ordinary circumstances ordinary words must bear their ordinary construction, and the whole will, that is, the whole of the words employed by the testator, must be looked at together so as to determine his whole intention. Furthermore, it is not on this principle legitimate to take words which have a general meaning and subject them to limitations which the words do not necessarily imply (412-3). PUTRA POUTRADI KRAME.

The words "putra poutradi krame" are, in India, apt words for conferring an estate of inheritance (62).

It was not denied at the bar that these words, though undoubtedly importing the male sex in their primary signification would, in the case of a gift to a male, be read as words of general inheritance, and would include female as well as male heirs where, by the law, his estate would descend to females; their Lordships feel no greater difficulty in applying them to the female heirs of a female where by law the estate would descend to such heirs and [illegible] sufficient reason for narrowing the construction of words which have been often recognised in India and by this Board as apt for conferring an estate of inheritance (62). ———Meaning of.
The word "Santana" means race, lineage, or posterity, and is still used among Hindus to mean male progeny without limitation. Telang, J. construes it as meaning "continuation"; other learned sanskritists interpret it to signify "an uninterrupted series" (of progeny or heirs). Vijnaneswara used it in the sense of lineal male descendants (220). (Mr Ameer Ali.) BUDDHA SINGH v. LALTU SINGH.

STRIKING OUT OR ALTERING OF.
———Permissibility—Conditions.
Courts ought not to strike out a portion of a clause in a will or to alter the words of a will, when the effect of doing so would be in effect to make a new will for the testator, and one which, so far from carrying his intentions into effect, would be in direct opposition to his intention, and indeed to his main object, expressed in other parts of his will (58-9). TECHNICAL WORDS.
———Effect of—Inconsistent words—Use of—Effect.
One of the two cardinal principles in the construction of wills, deeds, and other documents, is that technical words or words of known legal import must have their legal effect, even though the testator uses inconsistent words, unless those inconsistent words are of such a nature as to make it perfectly clear that the testator did not mean to use the technical terms in their proper sense. ———Mahomedan woman—Status, culture, rights and capacity for business—Comparison and contrast.
It is no doubt true that the Mussalman woman, when married, retains dominion over her own property, and is free from the control of her husband in its disposition; but the Hindu law is equally indulgent in that respect to the Hindu wife. It may also be granted that, in other respects, the Mahomedan law is more favourable than the Hindu law to women and their rights, and does not insist so strongly on their necessary dependence on, and subjection to, the stronger sex. But it would be unsafe to draw from the letter of a law, which, with the religion on which it is founded, is spread over a large portion of the globe, any inference as to the capacity for business of a woman of a particular race or country. In India the Mussalman woman of rank, like the Hindu, is shut up in the zenana, and has no communication, except from behind the purdah, with any male persons save a few privileged relatives or dependants; the culture of the one is not, generally speaking, higher than that of the other, and they may be taken to be equally liable to the pressure and influence which a husband may be presumed to be likely to exercise over a wife living in such a state of seclusion (585-6). HINDU WILLS ACT, 1870.
———S. 5—Reservation in—Effect of, upon powers of Administrator-General under S. 30 of Act XXIV of 1867 and under Act II of 1874.
The respondent relied upon the terms of S. 5 of the Hindu Wills Act, 1870, which provides that "nothing contained in this Act shall affect the rights, duties, and privileges of the Administrator-General of Bengal, Madras and Bombay respectively." It is by no means clear that a reservation in these terms was meant to have the effect of precluding the Administrator-General from accepting, if he thought proper, the devolution upon him of the administration of a Hindu succession, under S. 30 of the Act XXIV of 1867. But it does not appear to their Lordships to admit of doubt that the reservation cannot control the powers given to the Administrator-General by the Act of 1874 (117). (Lord Watson). A man's house being his castle, the ordinary rule is, that the outer door cannot be broken to execute civil process. But if the man had been arrested, and had then expelled the Sheriff's officer from his house, the latter might break open the outer door to enter and retake him. The fact that after the Sheriff's officer had once been lawfully in the house, and the man knew the officer was lawfully about to arrest him, he caused the officer to be expelled for the ———Hearing by—Non-appearance at, of appellant or plaintiff in error—Decision in case of.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Where the appellant or the plaintiff in error does not appear in the House of Lords on his writ or appeal coming on for hearing, the judgment is to dismiss merely, and not to affirm, unless their Lordships have considered the merits of the case. In no other circumstances would it be safe to give a judgment of affirmance in the last resort, that judgment making a precedent binding on all other Courts in whatever points were raised in the cause, and that judgment also being conclusive for ever between the parties (221). ———Hearing by—Non-appearance of party at—Decision on merits in case of—Propriety.

The House of Lords may consider the merits of the cause whether the party appealing shall appear or not, for their Lordships may consider the cause upon the printed cases laid before the House, though one of the parties does not appear to argue the question, or even though neither party argue it; nay, though there be no printed cases delivered in, provided that the proceedings in the Court below, being before their Lordships, are by them taken into consideration, and that the matter in question appears in the proceedings, there seems to be nothing which should absolutely preclude them from giving judgment either against or for the absent party. But then there must have been a hearing of the case, and on both sides ; that is, either a hearing at the bar, or by the causes delivered, or by examination of the whole proceedings below, as well on the one side as on the other (221). In the case of the judgments of the House of Lords, that is, of the Court of Parliament, or of the King in Parliament as it is sometimes expressed, it is unquestionably the strict rule, and ought to be distinctly understood as such, that no cause can be re-heard. Whatever, therefore, has been really determined in that Court must stand, there being no power of re-hearing for the purpose of changing the judgment pronounced. There cannot be a re-hearing upon the whole cause, and an entire alteration of the judgment once pronounced (215-6). (Lord Brougham.) RAJUNDER NARAIN RAE v. BIJAI GOVIND SING.

Under Art. 189 of the Civil Code of Quebec, a husband and wife may respectively demand a separation on the ground of outrage, ill-usage or grievous insult, and by Art. 190 :—

" The grievous nature and sufficiency of such outrage, ill-usage and insult are left to the discretion of the court, which, in appreciating them, must take into consideration the rank, condition and other circumstances of the parties."

The Code gave a right of appeal to the King in Council against the decision of the court below.
